MENUS

By Sister Mary

BREAKFAST — Sections of grapefruit, cereal, cream codfish puff, corn bread, maple syrup, milk, coffee.

LUNCHEON — Virginia vegetable stew, toasted corn bread, cottage cheese, raisin bread pudding, milk, tea.

DINNER — Savory baked mackerel with tartar sauce, buttered new beets, macaroni, celery and olive salad, mock angel food cake, shredded fresh pineapple, milk, coffee.

Sea shells or oysters are perhaps the most attractive variety of macaroni to use in a salad but the stick kind can be broken into inch lengths and used. The inch pieces will be neater if the paste is cooked in its entire length and cut with a sharp knife when blanched and drained.

Virginia Vegetable Stew

Three cups shredded cabbage, 3 small onions, 2 cups canned tomatoes, 3 tablespoons butter, 1 teaspoon sugar, 1/2 teaspoon salt, 1/2 teaspoon paprika.

Cover cabbage with cold water and let stand fifteen minutes. Drain. Melt butter, add cabbage, onions peeled and minced and tomatoes. Use as "sauce" tomatoes as possible. Season with salt, sugar and paprika, and cook twenty minutes over a hot fire that keeps the mixture constantly bubbling. Serve very hot. Garnish with triangles of toast if desired.

THE GARDEN

SUMMER COLD FRAME CROPS

With early vegetables out of the frames and into the garden, the practical gardener will put the frames to work at once for valuable early summer crops, notably cucumbers or melons or to start summer squash, late season tomatoes, peppers or egg plants. The sash will be ample protection for these tender plants until settled weather.

Early cucumbers are most practical for the home gardener who has a frame of the usual dimensions, 6 by 6. One hill may be planted in the center of the frame and the vines may be allowed to spread out to fill it. Under the protection of the sash the vines may make good growth safe from the attacks of insect pests and by the time the covers are removed they will have sufficient start to be able to withstand the ravages of bugs that take so many of the cucumber tribe in their infancy.

One such hill will furnish early slicing cucumbers until the main crop planted in the open after danger of frosts is over comes into bearing. A hill of melons may be grown in the same manner and give an early supply of cantaloupes. By using frames some ambitious experimental gardeners have been able to ripen honey dews by giving them an early start in the fall. This is too long a season melon for northern gardens under ordinary circumstances.

The supply of egg plants, peppers and tomatoes, however, forms the most practical use to which the cold frame can be put after the

Bridge Pointers

By Milton C. Work

Continuing the Saturday series of Bridge lessons for the novice, it is wise to note that there are few hands counting as high as 13 with which a beginner should not bid No Trump, unless he encounters one of the two most formidable of No Trump barriers:

(1) A blank suit or a worthless singleton.

(2) A five-card or longer Major suit and an unstopped suit.

When a player is so very short in any particular suit, it obviously means that the remaining three hands have 12 or 13 cards of that suit, and the distribution may be so uneven that one hand has an unusual number. If so, the odds are two to one that the greatest length is held by an adversary. The great menace to a No Trump hand with one unguarded suit is that the adversary with the initial lead will open the suit that dummy will also be without a stopper, and that the adversaries will win enough tricks before Declarer gets a lead to save game or even "set" the contract eventually. The chances that this will happen grow greater as Declarer's unguarded suit (so to speak) grows shorter; so when a player's weak suit is down to a worthless singleton, the risk is too great to take ordinarily—much too great when the player holds not even one card of the suit.

Most of the severe losses that result from light No Trump bids are caused when the adversary that has the original lead has a very long suit that he is able to run against the No Trumps, and it is for this reason that the blank suit or the worthless singleton is considered to be a No Trump barrier.

Of course the blank suit is even more dangerous than the worthless singleton. Suppose an initial bidder had any such marvelous hand as an A-K-Q-J in each of three different suits and a worthless singleton in the fourth suit. In spite of his wonderful picture gallery he might fail to make game—he might even fail to make his contract—if his adversaries should run the singleton suit and make five or more tricks in it before he could obtain the lead. It is therefore generally advisable to consider a worthless singleton as No Trump taboo.

earliest crops are removed and they will be ready to transplant into the ground. Celery plants may also be started in the cold frame to good advantage for an early crop.

The tender annuals for the flower garden may also be given an early start of a month on the regular season. Zinnias, salvias and cosmos may be ready to go into the open ground much ahead of their usual season by starting them in the cold frame.

Sociologist Sees Future Farm Run As Giant Mill or Factory

GRAND FORKS, N. D. (AP)—A picturesque reversal of the American agricultural system under which everyone would live in town, and farms would be populated only as mammoth industrial plants are populated—by workmen returning in their fall—is predicted by J. M. Gillette, professor of sociology at the University of North Dakota.

In this new mode of farming, he suggests, relationships between cities and farming communities would no longer exist as they do today, and country neighborhoods and communities would be entirely dissolved. Farming would be a purely commercial proposition rather than a family affair, and crops would be produced as factories are operated—by means of managers, foremen and hired men. Operators living in the cities would go to their farms only when they were needed.

Author of several text books on rural sociology, Professor Gillette declares that the farmer's dissatisfaction with isolated independence is one of the agencies causing migration of the rural resident to the city.

"Economic conditions," he says, "such as improvements in agricultural production, great expansion of urban domination and the post-war crisis in farming, have unsettled farm life and exerted a disturbing influence upon the relation of the farmer to other groups of society. Migration to the cities, at the rate of more than half a million a year, has continued until now 70 per cent of the population is non-agricultural."
