Pasteurization Of Milk Removes Germs

Consumers are continually issuing statements regarding the necessity for safe milk. "Clean" milk is not necessarily safe milk, says one, and he adds, "I have become convinced that at the present time greater safety lies in the exclusion of dangerous microorganisms and that pasteurized milk is advantageous to public health." It should be as much a requirement in any city as a good water supply.

All consumers will be interested in seeing the processes of pasteurization. The Blue Mountain Creamery will welcome an opportunity to show one how milk is pasteurized in a modern, sanitary milk plant. It is important to get acquainted with the milk plant, because from it one gets the most important food.

Mr. Tyler explained that much of the prejudice against pasteurized milk was due to the misunderstanding of the idea and process. Therefore, in a trip through the plant his explanations were quite interesting.

From Selected Herds—In the first place the milk is from selected herds approved by the state inspector. It is brought into the creamery where it is weighed, tested, and taster, and any milk which has any odors or any unpleasant taste is at once eliminated. In the spring, certain grasses and weeds found in pastures do affect the taste of milk.

Next the product is run through a centrifugal clarifier, where any impurities are removed. This machine operates something on the order of a cream separator, but takes none of the cream from the milk.

The Pasteurizing Process—From the clarifier, the milk goes into the big 200-gallon vat for the pasteurization process. In the center of the vat are large hollow, revolving coils, through which the steam is passed and by means of which the temperature of the milk is raised to 142 degrees Fahrenheit. It is kept at this heat for 30 minutes during which, according to authorities, all disease germs of every kind are killed. (125 degrees being the point beyond which disease germs cannot exist). There is no guess-work about this process for the temperature is ascertained by a recording thermometer which is in operation continuously.

The milk is then pumped through a milk filter for additional protection, then over cooling coils, first containing ordinary city water, then ice water. From this cooler, it is run into the sterilized bottles, capped and ready for distribution without ever having been touched by hands. After the bottles are filled, the milk being at a temperature of 45 degrees, all are placed in the refrigerator—where the temperature is always just above freezing—and kept there until delivery. The complete process takes about four hours' time.

Nothing Added or Lost—From this story of the process it will be seen that there is nothing added to the milk during the entire process, and nothing taken from it. Its quality remains unchanged so far as content is concerned, the only difference being that it is made safer for consumption.

The process of sterilizing the bottles is also quite interesting. The bottles are first placed in an inverted position, in a pressure washer, where a stream of an alkali solution is injected into them with considerable force. Next they go into an automatic rinsing, where cold water and hot steam are injected, thus removing all the alkali solution and thoroughly rinsing and sterilizing them at one operation. They are not touched by hands during the process.

The pasteurization department is a complete system at the Blue Mountain Creamery, in addition to the general creamery business. During the years Mr. Tyler has been connected with the local concern a retail delivery has never been made, but now with the demand for it, and with the ability to handle it, a complete route of the city is being inaugurated.

Mr. Tyler would appreciate visits of inspection to the plant when an attempt would be made to give a thorough understanding of the complete process.

FLIERS PAY LAST HONORS TO BENNETT

which the Bremen carried on its trans-Atlantic flight were laid across the grave of Floyd Bennett today by the German and Irish fliers, to commemorate his fidelity to the traditions of the air.

The aviators went to Arlington national cemetery early, and participated in a simple ceremony at the grave of their fellow aviator, who succumbed to illness contracted while flying to their aid at Greenly Island.

First Captain Hermann Koehl placed a wreath of green on the fresh earthen mound, which was already completely covered by floral tributes. Then Baron von Huenefeld went slowly forward and unfolded the flag of his country, to the wreath of his companion.

He was followed by Major James Fitzmaurice who lifted a huge silver emblem of green, white and orange. This Irish flag alike was spread sidewise over Floyd Bennett's resting place.

From Across Atlantic—Finally Mayor Howard Williams, commandant at Bolling field, produced a smaller emblem of the stars and stripes, which he put beside the Irish flag.

The American flag placed on Bennett's grave also was brought across the Atlantic on the Bremen. Miss Herta Junkers also placed a wreath of green on the mound.

Throughout the ceremony the fliers stood, with heads bowed in the rain. Each was asked to say something for the microphone and expressed the preference not to do so.

After leaving Bennett's burial place the group visited the grave of Lieut. Wooster, who lost his life in the disaster to the American Legion plane which crashed on trials made in preparation in an attempt to span the Atlantic.

MISS JUNKERS AND PILOT

Miss Herta Junkers, left, daughter of Dr. Hugo Junkers, designer of the monoplane Bremen, and Fred Mechoff, Junkers pilot, are pictured here as they prepared to take off from Mitchell Field, Long Island, in an effort to reach and rescue the stranded flyers on Greenly Island. They are standing before the Europa, sister ship of the Bremen and the only other Junkers plane of the type in the United States. They planned to fly to Old Orchard, Maine, on the first lap of their journey.

Crowd Small—The journey to Arlington was made during a rain which at times became driving. The weather conditions were similar to those which prevailed yesterday during the burial of Bennett with military honors.

Few on the streets knew the exact hour the German-Irish pilgrimage would pass and of these hardly a handful recognized the short caravan of army cars which sped down Pennsylvania avenue.

On the return trip to the field Von Huenefeld and Koehl stopped off at a news clothing store to do some shopping to reinforce their limited wardrobe. The Germans were still wearing the same clothes in which they had flown the Atlantic and those had taken on a rough and ready appearance. Their purchases included shirts and neckties.
