in any formal manner. Another international complication developed in the Balkans when Bulgaria disclaimed responsibility for outbreaks on the Yugoslavian border by the Macedonian revolutionaries. Civil strife has broken out among the comitadj and the frontiers have been closed. The difficulties developed from factional disputes which started in May when a revolutionary "army" could not agree whether to raid Jugoslavia or use more peaceful means of forwarding the cause of the perennial revolution. They culminated in the assassination of General Alexander Protogerov, a reported reprisal against his chief rival, Ivan Mihailoff, and the disappearance of the latter's associates. Gen. Ivan Valkoff, Bulgarian minister of war. Jugoslavia's domestic situation also failed to clear up. Gen. Steven Raditch who had been asked to form a "non-political" cabinet of experts, gave up the task. He told King Alexander that the present cabinet should continue until political passions, inflamed by the shootings in the Nettung treaties, had a chance to cool. France Opposes Move International politics stalked in to the musical celebration in Vienna of the centenary of Franz Schubert. The first indication of this came when the French minister was instructed to quit the city during the big singing fest. Location the affair was turning into a demonstration for a union of Austria with Germany, a movement which France opposes. It came out openly when 300,000 persons of German blood, gathered in and about the enormous hall built for the festival and took a solemn oath to make this union actual. Some 60,000 of these were members of German singing societies. They signaled their entry into Vienna by singing German monarchist songs as they marched through the streets. It was noted that Vienna's supply of beer gave out.
