CONTRACT BRIDGE
The revoke penalty has caused no end of discussion in contract and many disputes have arisen concerning the application of the law pertaining thereto, which provides that revoke penalty tricks count as if won in play and assist declarer to make his contract or to go game. (Law 43-b). But the law does not say that declarer can score game without bidding for it. Two examples:

Score 100. Declarer bids four spades and makes only two. Declarer's revoke and the two penalty tricks give him a total of 100 and his contract. Declarer scores game because he bid for it and ends up with enough tricks to make it. The penalty tricks count as if won in play and enable declarer to go game.

Score 100. Contract two spades. Declarer wins eight tricks in play and obtains two penalty tricks for an adverse revoke. Although he now has four tricks which is enough to make his contract, he does not score game because he did not bid for it. The penalty tricks only enable declarer to go game when he has bid for game.

The revoke law causes perplexities in other ways. Many players think that they should go back and change the cards in the trick in which the revoke occurred. That is not the law. The trick may be examined for evidence of revoke, but after the revoke has been made, the trick in which the revoke occurred cannot be altered and it remains in the possession of those who hold it. Even though they acquired it by revoke. Another common error lies in supposing that the side receiving revoke penalty tricks invariably score points therefore; that is not so either. For the first revoke, the side not in error receives tricks from the other side after the play of the hand is finished; and such tricks are counted toward the side's other tricks "the same as if they had been won in play." The total tricks thus counted may or may not give points to the side which counts them. For example:

Declarer down three but detecting an adverse revoke, would be down only one; the adversaries, however, would score for their revoke. Declarer would have scored, as he would be penalized for a set of one instead of three, but he would not score for the revoke. Copyright John E. Little Co.
