HEALTH

WHEN CHILDREN SEEM LAZY

By Charles L. Boynton, M. D.
Atlanta, Ga.
Member Georgia Memorial

The normal child, in my opinion, is not lazy. On the contrary the normal child is overflowing with enthusiasm and energy, is always active. Therefore, if a child appears to be lazy, he is mentally or physically sick. To correct this laziness, the parents should not scold the child but should seek to discover the cause by consulting a competent physician.

If your child is lazy, you can be sure he does not feel well. The trouble may be trivial or of short duration, or it may be the beginning of a malady leading to very serious results. The safest way to find out just what is the trouble is to consult a competent physician. Give the child the benefit of the doubt. Don't scold him—help him.

Every healthy good feeder should be more or less lazy after each meal to allow for proper digestion. This, however, should pass and pandemonium reign.

If the laziness tends to become continuous, it may be due to a chronic intestinal indigestion with its accompanying symptoms. The standing or sitting posture may be altogether incorrect with resulting fatigue, which may be interpreted as laziness. A beginning, but deep-seated, tubercular infection may be at work. The blood may be thin from a simple or more serious anemia. Hookworm or other intestinal parasites may be present. Some of the glands of intestinal secretion, especially the thyroid, may not be working efficiently, and consequently the slow movements of body and mind may be incorrectly interpreted as laziness.

The eyesight may be defective, with the resulting exhaustion due to eyestrain. Correct glasses may do away with the lethargy. Adenoids or enlarged tonsils may prevent enough oxygen entering the lungs to give energy to the body. These same causes may prevent sound sleep.

Too late hours, with not enough sleep; with older children too much reading with not enough out-of-doors exercise, too many moving pictures in stuffy rooms, too many late dances, too many "dates," all lead to exhaustion which is often called laziness.

During the changes which occur at puberty, that period during which the individual is neither child nor adult, laziness is often a symptom. The internal changes are making great demands upon the vitality and resources of the body. Laziness at this time is to be encouraged, rather than to call forth temper on the part of the parents. It will pass off after the changes have taken place.

The natural inheritance of children should be health, happiness, and energy expressed in the constant desire to be doing something. If these characteristics are not present, we grown-ups should not be in too big a hurry to hand down our judgment as "just lazy." In the majority of cases we should be wrong and perhaps find out our error too late to remedy the trouble.

Parental sympathy and intelligent study of the child will probably lead to a correct diagnosis.

The golden rule some people use is often very thinly plated . . . Of course you know it all but that is no excuse for telling it all to everybody you meet. . . . It is now possible to go across the U. S. by airplane in about 24 hours. It is also possible to go to the hereafter in much less time if the thing upsets. . . . Occasionally one of these "big hotter and egg men" carries his sign on his vest. . . . When it comes to making friends, a cheerful grin beats a kick on the shin. . . . Amos Tash says, "There wouldn't be so much objection to a fly alighting on a bald head if he would only remain quiet instead of immediately rearing back and starting to clean his front feet."

Mowing along the sides of country roads and highways is more than a kindness to travelers and an evidence of community spirit. It also prevents the spread of weeds to the neighboring fields. The weed nuisance can be checked to a large extent by planting trees and shrubs that shade the ground and discourage weed growth.

AT THE THEATERS

Rayart Pictures corporation has lived up to its promise to make "Casey Jones," their newest railroad thriller, which opens at the Colonial theater today, one of the outstanding pictures of the year. Along with comedy and pathos in good measure and a delightful love story, it is packed from beginning to end with breath-taking thrills.

Like the captain of a vessel the railroad engineer sticks to his post in the face of certain death, and Ralph Lewis as Casey Jones gives a vivid portrayal of the brave engineer of the song who, almost dying at the throttle, brings his special, with its precious shipment of gold, to its destination on time.

The climax comes when the heavy discovers that his own mother and the railway president's daughter are aboard Casey's train, and in his wild chase to ward off its destruction he meets his own death when his locomotive goes down with the bridge which had been weakened in his plot to rob the special.

Royal Northwest Mounted In "Code of Scarlet" road thriller, which opens at the veiled at the photographical beauty in "Code of the Scarlet," Ken Maynard's latest western now at the Star theater, it will be of interest to know that the entire picture, including the location scenes, were taken in California.

The picture is a story of the Canadian Northwest, and as a location spot had to be found that corresponded to the Canadian Rockies as much as possible, Harry J. Brown, director, chose the Sierra Madre mountains after two weeks of cruising about the state.

The exact location of the spot is a place called Crestline, a few miles from Lake Arrowhead, and just about 100 miles from Los Angeles. Here the wonderful cloud effects, the towering mountains, dense forest growth of the typical northwoods, was obtained.

The entire company, consisting of Gladys McConnell, leading woman, Ed Brady, J. P. McGowan, Dot Farley, Sheldon Lewis, Joe Rickson and Hal Salter were taken to Crestline for a three weeks' stay.

The ascent to this spot is probably one of the most hazardous of any in this vicinity. The auto stages and trucks can make the gruelling winding road but Tarzan and his two companions had to be unloaded at the bottom of the grade and walked up. Tarzan is too valuable a horse to risk any danger of injury.

A real action story, with thrills and spectacular riding, is the main feature of "Code of the Scarlet," a First National picture.

Photography in "Ramona" is Unusual

A 65 mile long scene—said to be the longest motion picture "shot" on record is one of the pictorial highlights of "Ramona," the Inspiration Pictures-Edwin Carewe photoplay starring Dolores Del Rio, now being shown at the Arcade theater.

This spectacular camera shot was taken from one of the summits of Cedar Brooks, in Southern Utah, from a height of more than 10,000 feet, and shows in the distance the peaks and palisades of Zion national park.

The scenic feats as filmed by the cameramen nearly two miles above sea level forms part of the sheep-shearing episodes in "Ramona." Because of the difficulty in approaching the site, and mounting cameras and other equipment in the high altitudes, this territory had never been filmed before by a movie company.

In this particular long range scene several thousand sheep are shown in the foreground, at shearing season, and the towering mountain caps 65 miles away, form a picturesque background for the action.

"This scene alone should provoke considerable praise and comment from filmgoers and students of the movies," declares Carewe. "It was a difficult shot, but one of the most beautiful I have ever seen recorded."

"Ramona" is an Inspiration-Carewe production, made under the personal direction of Carewe for United Artists release. In Dolores Del Rio's support are Warner Baxter and Roland Drew, as "Alessandro," the Indian lover and "Felipe" the Spanish Romeo. Other well-known screen players in the supporting cast include Vera Lewis, Michael Visaroff, Carlos Amor, Miss Del Rio's cousin and newcomer in films, Mathilde Comont and John T. Prince.

The library of Gene Tunney's Connecticut home is stocked with forty books, says a dispatch. Why, even lowbrow sports writers have read nearly that many!
