Economic Paradox Links Bumper Crops To Depressions In Farming

WASHINGTON (AP)—Bumper crops, usually considered an indication of farm profits and affluence, often are a menace to agricultural prosperity. The paradox is explained by the correlation of production and consumption. With crops they track value, bumper crops, comparative lines show, are accompanied by depressed price curves. Years of plentiful harvest, that swell the crops and grain bins with manifestations of production of difficulties, limited and depressive markets, unstable surplus and monetary losses...
