Flapper Vote Is Vexing Question
In Great Britain

LONDON, Sept. 25.—(AP)—How do you vote, my pretty maid, is a vexing question in Great Britain.

Five million little Joan Bulls, newly enfranchised by the "flapper" vote act, will cast their first ballots in the forthcoming general election, sometime next year, British political strategists say. The election will be won and lost on women.

A curious prejudice against the woman party worker on the part of women electors continues to baffie party leaders. The ordinary voter, the sanctified "flapper" thinks she knows as much about politics as anybody.

The task is to overcome this feeling. Party leaders admit they never will get enough men workers to argue and convince all the women electors of the country.

Each party the Conservatives, Liberals and Laborites, has divided the country into areas, and set up a woman's organization in each. The Conservatives are training women organizers in special classes, and will have thousands of women workers to draw out of the million members of the National Women's Conservative association.

The Labor party has 300,000 members of their women's section.

They say every one of them is available for political spadework.

Megan Lloyd George, fighting for a seat in Parliament beside her famous father, former Premier David Lloyd George typifies the Liberal effort.

All sorts of devices already are being used to capture the interest and allegiance of the elusive "flapper" voter. There are afternoon teas, sewing classes, entertainments, evening functions, all with a dash of politics thrown in.

CHEMISTS BRING GREAT CHANGES, was the headline in a Boston newspaper the other day. If you doubt it just try drinking some of the stuff they sell now—days.
