Bridge Pointers

By Milton C. Work

Continuing our series of Contract hands in which the only bidding is done by North and South, East and West passing whenever it is their turn to declare, we will examine today and tomorrow, and also Friday and Saturday of next week, hands in which South and North have very strong No Trump holdings; hands with which slam bids are tempting, but the question is whether they should be risked.

Today's Hand

Before reading the explanation that follows, make up your mind how the hand should be bid by South and North at Contract Bridge.

The bidding South's hand has every suit stopped and counts 21 (on the basis of Ace 4, King 3, Queen 2 and Jack 1); he should bid three No Trumps.

South's bid encourages North to think that the combined hands may contain a slam. North has strength in three suits and a count of 16 which is sufficient to justify him in suggesting to a partner who can bid three No Trumps, that a slam is probable. He might bid four No Trumps, but that would not show his Diamond Ace; so he bids four Diamonds, which bid made over three No Trumps tells South that North has the Ace of Diamonds and other help for a No Trump. With no strength but the Ace of Diamonds, North would pass.

Boys' names sometimes are placed on the waiting lists of English schools as soon as the child is born.

After North's bid of four Diamonds, South, if he wished to continue the slam showing, could bid four Hearts or four Spades; but South knows that North has no more Aces to show because South has the remaining three, and South having bid an absolutely minimum three No Trumps, should not encourage North to further slam bidding. Consequently South should bid four No Trumps; that would be notice to North that South has bid a minimum three No Trumps and does not desire the slam bidding to continue unless North be marvelously strong. As that is not the case, North passes the four No Trumps.

It will be noted that to make a Slam in the hand, South would have to win two or three finesses. As the odds are against this, it is much wiser not to risk a slam bid.

HEALTH

FRACTURES OF THE ANKLE JOINT

By Frank D. Dickson, M. D., Kansas City, Mo.

There is an old adage—"a bad sprain is worse than a break." As in many of these sayings which have come down to us through generations, there is a certain element of truth in this particular one. This does not lie, however, in the statement that a sprain is worse than a break, but in the fact that the bad sprain is usually in reality a break, or fracture of a bone in the region of a joint, a fact that was often overlooked before the introduction of the X-ray.

It is a very easy matter in these days of high-heeled shoes and other types of poorly supporting footwear, to turn the foot and sustain what is often considered a sprain of the ankle. Also, with the speeding up of life generally, due to the automobile and increasing activity in sports, injuries of all kinds are on the increase among these injuries to joints. An injury to the ankle joint is particularly serious, as this joint bears the entire body weight, is used constantly in standing and walking, and is subject at all times to great strain. The integrity of this joint and its smooth working is dependent upon the various bones which compose it being absolutely in their proper relation to each other. The chief damage done in a fracture or break of the ankle is that there is always a tendency for the bones composing it to become displaced so that the joint does not work smoothly and a painful ankle results, which is carried through life. The displacement of the bones in a break at the ankle may be very slight and still seriously interfere with the mechanism of the joint, the most usual displacement resulting in the production of a fallen arch or flat foot, which is always a painful foot both for standing and walking. It should not be concluded, however, that every flat foot or fallen arch is the result of a fracture of the ankle, for that is not true; it is, however, a very common deformity resulting from such injuries.

Any severe injury to the ankle joint, then, should be given a very careful examination—this examination to include the taking of X-rays, as, apparently, what is apparently a sprained ankle is really a fractured or broken ankle and needs careful treatment. Above all, it should be remembered that in the experience of surgeons, it is the apparently slight injury to the ankle which causes the most of the trouble; bad injuries which cause much displacement of the bones and deformity are readily recognized and treated. It is the mild injury with little displacement or deformity which is overlooked and leads to the chronically painful ankle, which means inability to lead an active life.
