Sweet Band Or Hot Band? Well, One Has Violin

"Boy, that's a hot orchestra!" and "Isn't that orchestra sweet?" are more or less common expressions when the dance music is good, but how many of the dancers know that there really are hot and sweet orchestras and bands? Local musicians give this definition: a hot band consists of the following instruments: piano, sax, cornet, trombone, banjo and drum, and it is generally accepted that good results are seldom possible with less than six pieces, they assert: sweet combination: piano, sax, violin, bass or other sax, banjo and drum. In eight-piece bands the sweet band would substitute a violin for a clarinet. It is said that New York and other metropolitan centers like the sweet bands while outlying districts prefer their "hot." They also state that 11-piece bands and orchestras result in the most satisfactory music, pointing out that all the well known organizations over the country have a complete instrumentation. In reference to the trend in popular music, it is reported that there is a recurrence at present to melody, with quite a few old-time melodies included. They also point out that dancers in general want simple arrangements. Some authorities declare that 80 per cent of American dancers do not understand music technically and that when bands play involved arrangements the dancers frequently pause and lose their rhythm. They say that a good indication of a successful arrangement is when the dancers begin humming or singing. The trend is also toward specializing on a single instrument, except in cases where it is easy to double, such as the sax and violin.
