slackened in intensity it appeared to observers that the rebels had drawn back, at least temporarily.

United States troops on guard duty at the line were forced to seek shelter behind buildings as bullets hissed through practically every open space in the southern half of the Arizona town.

As the rebels drew away it became apparent that they had suffered some casualties. Sporadic outbursts of vicious musketry continued alternately on either flank.

Governor Protests— Advice that the soldiers would be moved across Arizona soil caused Governor John C. Phillips, of Arizona, to protest to the state department at Washington. Governor Phillips declared that the movement of Mexican soldiers across Arizona would violate the state constitution and its military code and would endanger American lives.

Last night Governor Phillips declared he had received assurance from Washington that "Arizona's sovereignty would be respected in the matter."
