THE GARDEN

LETTUCE, LEAF AND HEAD.
There has recently come a recognition that the old-fashioned lettuce had something in the way of flavor not possessed by the more attractive head lettuce with its closely packed cabbage head. It is well worth growing in the garden as a change from the head lettuce now so common and so cheap in the market that there isn't so much incentive for the home gardener who usually has his troubles getting the fine solid heads of a professional market gardener.

Head lettuce must be started early in the house or in a hotbed to have any degree of assurance of getting good because they must form their heads before hot weather sets in or up they go to seed. Sow the seed early and transplant the seedlings into flats once before setting them out in the garden if possible. The two transplanting, according to some successful head lettuce growers, make a heavier root system and speed growth and the consequent heading.

A compromise between the leaf and the head lettuce with the best qualities of both is the cos lettuce. It has the blanched central leaves and is the finest flavored of the lettuces. It is an upright grower with long narrow leaves overlapping at the tips, thus covering the center of the plant. It may be assisted by lightly tying it with raffia. This lettuce does not need the early indoor start but may be sown outside as soon as the soil is workable. It requires thinning to six inches apart for its best development.

For the finest quality lettuce, a rich soil, plenty of moisture and cool weather are the essentials. It is the earliest crop to go into the ground. If you desire to return to the old-fashioned lettuce after struggling with head lettuce, try a cos lettuce or the Grand Rapids or black seeded Simpson leaf lettuce. They are an fine salad material so far as crispness and flavor are concerned as the head lettuce but they must be gathered fresh from the home garden to preserve the crisp quality. Crisp leaf lettuce can't be expected in the market where it must stand for some hours.

New Homes For Old

If You Should Want To Sell Your Home

The first impression made on the prospective buyer or renter is vastly important. The general appearance of your home attracts the customer and convinces him of its value above anything else.

If it is well kept up, in good repair and modern in its equipment, half of the selling job is done. The place that is run-down and neglected in appearance loses value far beyond its real possibilities.

To bring your home up-to-date is to increase its value much more than the cost of the improvements. You can remodel it at low cost—a new room, a new porch, a new exterior—these things can give you a big return on your investment whether you expect to sell the home, rent it or continue to live in it.
