MENUS

By Sister Mary
Pineapples usually come to us from a great variety of fruits is not plentiful and we welcome them both as a food and as a garnish. They add much to all fruit salads and combine well with other fruits.

Pineapple juice has a soothing effect on the membranes of the throat and often is used in throat troubles. Its vitamin content is good, comparing favorably with oranges. Canning causes some loss of the vitamin, so the fresh fruit should be used in season.

The rough skin of the pineapple is an excellent lodging place for dust and dirt. A thorough scrubbing with a brush and water is a wise precaution before paring off the rind. A pineapple weighing two pounds will yield about four cups of grated fruit or two cups of cubed.

It's easier to pare the fruit if it's cut in inch slices first. The skin is then pared off and the eyes removed. These should be dug out with a sharp pointed knife. The skin and eyes often make the mouth sore if care is not taken to cut out every one.

If the fruit is sprinkled with sugar at least half an hour before serving, the flavor is more bland. Several hours or over night standing in sugar improves the fruit even more than the prescribed half hour.

Many delicious and unusual ways of serving pineapples are used by housewives in different sections of the country. Pineapple combines an appetizing vegetable
