Abolition Of Trade In Wives Is First On Algerian List of Reforms

By John Evans (Associated Press Staff Writer) ALGERIA (AP) — Buying and selling of wives is soon to be abolished from the Kabyle "kasouas," or customs, the code of traditions that governs the social life of several million natives. This is the first of the age-old native practices to be recommended for reform by a mixed commission.

A bill to translate this into law is before the French parliament with every prospect that it will be adopted. There are many other changes contemplated, but it is the intention to go slowly for two reasons. First, because France pledged her word she would not interfere with native customs; second, because she would invite trouble by upsetting native life.

Revolutionary as it is, the proposed law of betrothal merely requires a declaration of intent by the bride and groom or their families and fixes the minimum age at 15. The custom which dates back farther than history goes, requires that the man buy the bride from her father or nearest male relative. The girl's consent is unnecessary. She may be delivered to her husband by force.

The Kabyle woman, often sold into marriage when only seven years old, has no property rights, except that she may own the clothes she is wearing.

The husband divorces and feeds his wife as he wishes; she complains by her will be heard by the Gaid, or chief officer of the local assembly, who dispenses justice. If the husband dies the wife goes to his heir, as part of his property. Many native leaders, conversant with customs of other lands, favor radical reforms, but it is on their advice that the French propose to go slowly.

MAINE FINDS HER SENATOR IS NOT "DRY"

There was no breach in Maine. Mrs. Althea G. Quimby, state president of the W. C. T. U., said that "Senator Gould was not the candidate of the W. C. T. U. Certainly the organization will be even more frank and outspoken against his reelection."

VIEWS IN SHARP CONTRAST WASHINGTON, June 28 (AP)—Prohibition enforcement officials hold views in sharp contrast to those expressed by Senator Arthur H. Gould, of Maine, in his defense of his "right to have, make and drink" light wines and beer.

Stripes were abolished in Colorado prisons 29 years ago, but an especially dangerous prisoner still is so garbed.
