Legal Flaw In Divorce Decree Gives Life Convict New Chance

LINCOLN, Neb. (AP)—Fate turned a flip-flop for Robert E. Garrett, convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment for a brutal slaying in the rugged Nebraska sandhills region.

Through a queer twist in a 28-year-old divorce law his sentence has been lifted by a one-day margin and he has a good chance to win freedom.

Garrett's estranged and presumably divorced wife convicted him with her testimony. She was the only witness of the killing of William Kinsley, the ranchman for whom she was acting as housekeeper.

The packed courtroom was tense as she took the witness stand and told her dramatic story, accusing Garrett.

She told how Kinsley was shot down as he passed the living room window at the ranch—the roar of the gun—his fall. Then she ran to the window, peered out, and saw a figure crouching in the gloom, smoking a gun in hand. The figure was Garrett, she testified.

Leveling the gun at her he took her many miles into the country before releasing her, she said.

Garrett denied that story, denied the slaying, and as the trial progressed produced an alibi to show he was many miles from the scene of the slaying. But the jury other men, two of whom were said to be Eddie Welch and Sam Cummings, were expected to be taken into custody momentarily.

Frank Goddard was taken to a hospital where he underwent an emergency operation last night in what authorities said was an attempt to forestall possible fatality as a result of having been kicked in the stomach by his assailants.

Now it is the state's turn to seek loopholes and technicalities in the law. In the meantime Garrett is held in prison, awaiting retrial.

The law, the supreme court ruled, is constitutional, and when Garrett again faces the bar the state's chief witness—his wife—cannot point at him in accusation.

Illinois has 400 new laws, passed by the last legislature.
