Paris Style Changes Slow Autumn Shopping

By Diana Merwin (Associated Press Fashion Editor) PARIS (AP)—The general season of winter buying is being retarded here, it is generally conceded, because the timid many are hanging back to see the length of the skirts of the powerful few before placing their orders.

Couturiers who launched the radical change in skirt lengths and silhouettes complain now that their usual clients are late in ordering because they're afraid of getting clothes that are too long, or too short, too conservative or too daring, all depending on the way they intend to dress.

"The 'see woman,' one important dressmaker says, 'will pick a medium skirt length this first season.'

He describes this autumn's styles as "transition" clothes, meaning fashions on which later ones are to be based.

Whether skirts eventually remain long or decrease in length, all depends on women's reaction to this season's offering, he thinks.

Not only skirts and waistlines have changed, according to this particular couturier, but bodices are to be much more fitted under the arms and around the waistline.

The bagging, loose fitting dress which hangs straight from armpits to hips is a thing of the past, in his opinion. The new tendency is toward incruising corsages, the curve beginning under the arm.

A British doctor says the bathroom is the most pestiferous room in the house. This was discovered several years ago by plumbers. A former treasury official says the new currency is dangerous. Several people we know are cravinging adventure.
