MENUS

By Sister Mary

Every woman feels her reputation as a hostess is more or less based or made by the character of the coffee she serves her guests and the everyday brew for the family is no less important.

There is no hack or magic about good coffee. However, here are a few important principles to keep in mind. Blend, method of procedure and accuracy are of first consideration.

When purchasing coffee, the best and the grind as well as the brand must be considered. There are several different kinds of coffee—heavy or dark, light, medium, Italian and French.

There are three grinds—pulverized, medium and coarse. The method of making the beverage determines the grind chosen.

Experts originate the various kinds for the market and they are calculated to please the different tastes.

The roasting of coffee makes it brittle enough to grind and also affects chemical changes which are the distinguishing coffee flavor and fragrance. Careless handling at home often greatly injures these qualities which have been so painstakingly developed. Coffee bought in quantity should be stored in air-tight containers in a dry place.

Grinding Coffee at Home

If coffee is ground at home, it should always be ground just before using. The grinding breaks up coat of the berry. This coat is the natural protection against loss of flavor.

Commercially ground and packed coffee has many advantages. Almost any blend, roast or grind obtainable, packed in packages which prevent any deterioration until opened in the home. After opening, careful storage is essential.

Accurate measurements are unnecessary for coffee as for cake. While the amount of coffee needed in a cup of water varies somewhat according to the brand, this is changed easily after the first pot of the beverage is made.

Purified coffee is best for use. The drip or filtered method, evaporated coffee requires the medium ground coffee-bean, while packed coffee is made with the same grind.
