Health Talks

INDIAN MEDICINE

At a recent meeting of the New York Academy of Medicine a most interesting discourse on "The Medicine of the American Indian" was delivered.

By direct association with Indians and through careful study of their records it has been possible to accumulate a mass of data which casts a creditable light on the medical skill of the first Americans.

It is found that the practices of medicine and surgery by the American Indians was not only of a high type but could even stand comparison with that of our white ancestors of those same periods of development or even, in a certain extent, with those of the same date as exemplified among the pioneers.

The diseases common to the American Indian in his uncontaminated state differ markedly from those affecting the contemporary white population. Thus the Indians knew little or nothing of tuberculosis, the common infectious diseases, or cancerous growths.

The medicine man's treatment of accidents, of fractures and bruises, was excellent. His use of splints in the treatment of broken bones paralleled closely that of the most expert surgeon.

Drugs were employed extensively, chiefly in the form of brews and decoctions, though some were eaten in their raw state. The Indians used cathartics and purges, emetics and drugs to cause sweating. They employed the knife or its substitute to open abscesses.

Injuries of muscles or joints were treated by massage. They practiced cupping, and many similar forms of treatment making use of physical agents. In amputations, weakness and prostration, they were most up to date in feeding the surer bone marrow, goose or duck eggs and liver.

The Indians used few sedative drugs, and no analgesics (pain relieving drugs); since in his conception it was an unmanly act to manifest anything but contempt toward physical suffering.

Tragedy Stalks Into Family Life

GRAND ISLAND, Neb., Feb. 14 (AP)—Tragedy trekked with the Alfred Ellcocks, walking west from Chicago seeking work. The Ellcocks straggled into Wood River, near here, yesterday seeking medical aid for the three-months-old infant Mrs. Ellcock carried in her arms. The mother was so weak from lack of nourishment she could hardly speak. A tot of a boy, just two years old, dragged weakly by her free hand. He was cold and hungry. Neither he, his mother nor his father had eaten for two days and they had been walking, walking, walking.

Wood River citizens took them in, fed them, clothed them, warmed them. But before that, the mother was so weak from lack of nourishment she could hardly speak.
