Health Talks

A WINE MERCHANT'S SON

Seemingly there is little advantage in being the son of a wine merchant, even in Styria, Austria, in the latter part of the 18th century.

But to Leopold Auenbruger, the hero of our tale, this proved of distinct value, for one the basis of his boyhood experience he was enabled to make a valuable contribution to the art of diagnosis; a contribution which puts his name among the patron saints of medicine.

Leopold helped his father in selling wine. Many a time he was sent to the wine cellar to draw off a liter of Mascala. Then he learned the wine merchant's skill in telling the level of the beverage in the barrel by beating on its staves. A hollow sound was elicited above the fluid level, and a dull one when the body of the fluid was reached.

It was a simple skill and one that no one before him had thought to apply to the human body. But Auenbruger, when he had mastered the science of medicine and practiced it in the hospital of the Holy Trinity at Vienna, bethought himself that the human chest was but a skin-covered barrel and that by tapping on it sounds should be elicited which ought to be of help in diagnosis.

And in the end he found that indeed the sounds differed, and that the difference in pitch and quality could reveal to the initiated the underlying state of the body.

After many years of study he published a little book, in Latin. But alas, as was all too commonly the case, Auenbruger's valuable discovery was disparaged by his contemporaries. Perhaps it would have been forever lost to the world had it not been for Napoleon's physician, Corvisart, who in 1808, one year before Auenbruger's death, saved it from oblivion by translating it from the Latin to French, and endorsing it strongly.

And we are eternally grateful to him and to the son of the wine merchant, Leopold Auenbruger.
