Radio Pictures Brings Delmar Story to Screen

Night clubs and smart, palatial ballrooms have had endless exploitation on the screen, but for the first time the popular priced dance hall wins recognition in Radio Pictures' dancing, all-talking, human drama, "Dance Hall," which opens Friday at the State theatre.

One of the largest and most elaborately decorated dance floors in the southwest—that on the Venice pier in California, overlooking the ocean—was used as the setting for many of the scenes, and Mann's

Chats With Parents

ALONE TO SCHOOL. By Alice Johnson Peale. When is a child old enough to go to school by himself?

It is a simple question which is frequently asked and to which there is, unfortunately, no fixed answer.

Going to school alone like a good many other things that we are anxious to have children learn is something which depends on a variety of circumstances and on the particular child with whom we have to deal.

The six-year-old who attends a suburban or a country school which is not far away from home and who needs to make few crossings on unfrequented thoroughfares can often manage quite nicely all by himself.

On the other hand the child who attends a school in the midst of the traffic in a big city may need an adult to take him until he is 11 or 12.

Not only is the location of the school to be considered but also the type of child. Some children naturally learn very early to cope with concrete, practical situations. Others, as we say, have their heads in the clouds.

This last sort of child needs to be taught very carefully how to conduct himself at street crossings. He should be taught to wait at the curb until the street is clear or the traffic policeman signals him to cross across. He must be helped gradually to develop his independence.

Instead of taking him all the way to school we may after a time to leave him at a certain corner. We may let him cross streets by himself under our watchful eyes.

But by and by he will learn to take care of himself until at last he is able to take the entire journey on his own.
