Chats With Parents

PATIENCE
By Alice Johnson Peale
Patience is one of those old-fashioned virtues which, for parents at least, can never be out-moded. From the time children learn to crawl until they have passed the painful stage of adolescence their demands upon our patience never cease. The modern mother knows that patience in the nursery is more than an abstract, ethical duty; it is her contribution to her child's development. Unless she is patient of his first awkward efforts to pull on his shoes, to turn the water taps, to carry his chair, she knows that she is obstructing his growth and standing in the way of his learning.

Children learn with their hands and it is for children, blundering little fingers that mothers need most patience during those early years. Later on our children find more complicated ways to try us. It is during the ages of 6 and 10 that we need to keep in mind that children are children, not small adults. For years, then we need to remember that they probably will be only awkward, loud and more or less dirty.

They will break in on our pleasant social hours. They will leave black marks on the towels and spill things at table. And always we need to bear in mind that children may be trained, may be guided, may be taught, but that nothing worth while was ever yet accomplished by the sharp voice and the angry moment which marks the momentary loss of our own self-control.
