Siamese Twins In Frogs Made By Scientists

IOWA CITY (AP)—Twins are produced at the University of Iowa by a surgical operation which grafts two young animals together as Siamese twins or other combinations hitherto unknown.

This grafting is done only on animals of a low order, principally tadpoles and newts. Its purpose is to show certain relations between the sexes, particularly the dominance of male over female characteristics.

Making these strange twins is reported to the American Association for the Advancement of Science by Prof. Emil Witsech of the university's department of zoology. The operation is called parabiosis.

"The animals may be united side by side so that they appear like Siamese twins or one behind the other, forming chains," Professor Witsech says.

"Often in parabiosis only one animal will feed. Nevertheless its co-twin grows at the same rate, proving the latter receives an abundant food supply through the established blood connections. If the two animals of a pair are of the same species they grow and differentiate at the same rate. If they are of different species, the faster growing one will dominate and direct development of the other."

Leopard frogs are cited as examples. They normally take four months for development, but they cut this time in half when "twinned" with wood frogs, which have a faster growing period.

Professor Witsech finds definite dominance of male over female elements.
