BROKEN DEFENSES

Occasionally one reads or hears of an unfortunate person who dies of blood poisoning, resulting from some slight injury.

It may have been a pin prick, a small blister or a seemingly insignificant tear in the skin. But, to the sorrow of the sufferer, it was big enough a break to lead to death.

'Germs' are infinitesimally small. Ordinarily they cannot pass through the unbroken skin. But when the skin is broken, no matter how small the break, the "hole" is large enough to admit countless germs.

Still, even if but a few germs gain admission, the danger is great. For germs are living things. Once inside the body they have plenty to feed on, and so can multiply. One germ may in a few hours be the parent of thousands, in more time of countless millions.

Of course, not all germs are alike, either in the nature of the injury they may inflict or in the speed with which they may multiply. But the layman has no way of knowing which of the germs ever present on our skin and on all things about us may have gotten in.

For this reason it is best to give one's self the benefit of the doubt, and, after every injury, no matter how slight, use disinfectants.

Disinfectants are chemicals in the skin. If a little alcohol flows, let it flow a while. It will help wash out germs that might have entered. Then apply an antiseptic and keep the wound clean. If you haven't a medical antiseptic handy don't use soap and water or any weak acid like vinegar. Alcohol also destroys germs.

If there is pain, redness, swelling and pus, infection has set in. It is a danger to acute. Neglect may mean serious injury and even loss of life.
