Liquor Test Case Won By Defendant

The first of the government's test cases against the Oregon restaurant owners was today won by the defendant. The court ruled in favor of the defendant, who had argued that the prohibition law was unconstitutional.

Federal District Judge Frank H. Johnson yesterday rendered his decision in the case. He ruled that the prohibition law was unconstitutional because it violated the right of free trade between states.

NOW MORE THAN EVER IS YOUR NEED OF A MODART FOUNDATION

With summer and its restless days—the silhouette—1936 you must be perfectly equipped, and these creations by Modart will prove a joy.

A VARIED ASSORTMENT $4.95 to $7.50

New figure lines need new creativity and this season's models at Modart attain the correct lines with the flexibility and freedom demanded by modern women. Lightly toned or entirely untoned, the soft silky fabrics contour and mold the figure, smoothing curves and harmonizing proportions.

A news dispatch says that more people were injured last year while engaged in commonplace occupations around the home than in automobile accidents. Perhaps that explains why the younger generation prefers the family car to helping in the kitchen.

Hiskey Cannon says that his political activities are strictly private business. The amount of newspaper space given his opposition to Al Smith in the last election, however, leads us to believe this is the first time the Hiskey's attitude on privacy has been made public.

Records for 1935 show that more candy was consumed by the American people last year than ever before. Government statistics also reveal that cigarettes reached a new high mark in sales the same year. So when one considers that the two industries have been fighting each other vigorously in much paid space in newspapers and magazines, there is only one conclusion to be drawn. Advertising public business more rapidly than aggressive competition injures it.

TOWNS STRENGTHEN ALIKE

A great change has come upon American towns in the last 20 years. American towns are strikingly alike. This is as true now as it was at the beginning of this century. Yet the similarity nowadays is different from the similarity of two decades ago.

Slowly and steadily our towns are losing the peaceful, detached air that once was theirs. Not long ago, the casual traveler easily could find a small city that was many leagues removed from anything suggesting of modernity or up-to-dateness. Dusty main streets, wooden sidewalks, quiet squares, a general atmosphere of peaceful somnolence and unimpaired friendliness—these were the characteristics of the minor city until recently.

But the change has come. Every town, even the smallest, is alive, nervously eager to grow bigger and noisier than before. The dusty main streets have become brick or cement; the wooden sidewalks have long since been replaced; even the remotest town has its radio store, its up-to-the-minute garage, its commercial club, its movie theater and so on. The old sleepiness is gone, and the same speed of modern America has replaced it.

There are many people to whom all this seems a shame. Doubtless it is true that there was something extremely attractive about the old type of town; the town where life flowed in a moderate, unimpaired manner, where people could spare time from the rush of making money to enjoy the unique privileges of the small city—peace, rest and quiet. And, infinitely, there is something repellent about many modern towns; they are, some of them, so hurried, so hunched, so faintly and unmanfully ugly. Yet this is progress, even though it may often seem to some people like deterioration.

For the change that has come upon the small city is only a symptom of the change that has come upon the country as a whole. As a people, we have become tremendously busy. We are in a mighty hurry, and it is worth remembering that we are hurrying toward something, not away from something. We have a goal, and we are working toward it, even though we may not always see just what it is.
