CLEARING HOUSE

Steps should be taken at the earliest possible moment to put into effect the suggestion made by Governor Roosevelt, of New York, that the 48 states cooperate in establishing a states bureau which would act as a clearing house for information pertaining to state legislation and administration.

Such a bureau, properly organized and staffed, would carry on during the intervals between the annual conferences of governors, keeping all governors and legislative bodies informed at all times of what the others are doing.

The there-oughta-b-a-law mind and the other sort of mind that sees in everything a move to enact more unnecessary laws immediately look upon the Roosevelt plan as a system for recommending to other states new statutory experiments. It conceivably could operate with opposite results.

Many laws are enacted by legislatures and signed by governors because they are in ignorance of the failure of similar legislation in other states. Too often commonwealths hear of the praises sung to proposed laws in remote states and hear not the lamentations that follow their adoption.

There most certainly should be an agency that would keep all administrators and legislators informed of the successes and failures in state government.

The final evacuation of the country west of the Rhine at this time—more than four and a half years before the date set in the Versailles Treaty—can be attributed almost entirely to the Dawes Plan and the Young Plan. Evacuation was conditioned on Germany's meeting certain conditions regarding reparations and disarmament. The conditions have been met and the allies have carried out their part of the been met and the allies have carried out their part of the contract.

While the French may argue that occupation was essential to their national security, they will not deny that it contributed nothing to the amity of nations and the establishment of world peace and served to aggravate the traditional hatred and suspicion between themselves and the neighboring Teu-

Now the water supply is taken as a matter of course but such was not the case a few years back when strict limitations were in force-when lawns and gardens needed water the most there was very little except for drinking purposes. The most beautiful of tropical sea-folk is the moonfish, often called the ghostish because of its paper-thin form of a silver color. The parrottish attracts attention as much by its gorgeons colorings of turquoise him, plum, purple or bright green as by the peculiar bony beak.

The new metal, beryllium, comes from beryl, which is a hard gem stone, of which emerald and aquamarine are variations. Beryl contains about 14 per cent beryllium exide and occurs in feldspar, especially in New Hampshire and North Carolina. Beryllium is the world's Carolina.
