HOW THE IMNAHA HAPPENED TO GET PERMANENT NAME

Imnaha camped at the mouth of Sheep creek. The horses were herded into the brush coral and the Indians rolled in their blankets without kindling a fire for fear they would attract the enemy.

The Nez Perce had scarcely closed their eyes in sleep before the Nez Perce were among their horses. The snoring of the animals and the yelling of the enemy had surprised Nez Perce after them, but being on foot they were no match for the mounted enemy. Their horses were clattering away from the canyon with the Snakes riding hard on their trail. There was nothing to do but wait the coming of day and the chief's arrival. But before Imnaha slept, he decided to leave on foot in pursuit. Visions of the sleek, black yearling were fading, but he must rectify his stupidity in some manner before his chief.

At dawn Imnaha was away with a strip of jerked venison as only pack. He knew the odds were against him. The enemy was mounted. They were many hours ahead of him. He wore only soft moccasins to protect his feet from the sharp rocks of the trail. Hackberry and thorn bush scratched at his limbs. The trail wound ever upward. The going would have daunted one less sinewy. His pulses beat in his body but he never slackened his pace except to drink at an occasional spring. He came at last to their burned out campfire. He could see his horses' hoof prints. He was encouraged. They would not suspect him of following on foot. They would stop to eat. He would keep up his steady gait and if the gods were with him, so overtake them before they reached Snake River. If they ever crossed into their own territory he was lost. He must go on faster and faster.

The afternoon sun sank below the tops of the dense pines that flanked the distant ridge, and evening changed swiftly to dusk. The mauve shades turned quickly to purple and from purple to black. Velvet night closed in around the Indian. Nothing but the chirping of the myriads of crickets and the call of the night birds disturbed the hush of the night.

As Imnaha neared the summit of the divide between the Snake river valley and the "Land of Many Waters" he detected the smell of smoke from a camp fire. This pass has since been named "Freeze Out Gap," due to the fact that two white men were nearly frozen while trying to spend the night here.

The Snakes had eaten a heavy meal and rolled in their blankets near the far side of the pass. The smell of cooked meat was plain to Imnaha. He had hoped for this. The Snakes would have eaten to limit and their drugged senses would aid in his work. He remained a while in hiding among the chaparral of the pass. He could hear the uneasy stamp of his animals picketed near by. The Indian at last came out from his hiding, "ac" and cautiously approached the sleeping Snakes. He was not a cooked flesh gave him a feeling of uneasiness. It was not bear nor yet deer, neither was it grouse. The peculiar sweetness of it told him it was horse flesh. He was not surprised at this, however, as he knew it was their custom to eat horse flesh when food was scarce. As he speculated as to the next move, his keen eye observed what appeared to be the small hoof of a colt near the dying embers; black and sleek was the hair on the bone of the slender leg, with white fetlock. To the seething brain of the intrepid Imnaha came a vision of his coveted prize colt in its death struggle—so should the enemy pay with life blood.

The knife that the Snakes had used to dress his beloved colt lay still bloody near the embers. With a bound, the Indian, now a savage, gripped it and lunged to his first victim. With a convulsed shudder the sleeping Snake joined his fathers, and so from body to body until all four Snakes lay dead in their gore, lunged the undaunted Imnaha. Vengeance was sweet. With the stoic calmness of his race, Imnaha called to his mount among the band and was answered by a joyful whinny.

In a very few minutes he was riding behind his band headed for "The Land of Many Waters." Noon of the next day found him at the mouth of Sheep creek, weary but exalted over his victory. His return was a thing of great joy among the waiting Nez Perce. The chief and his followers held a pow wow in his honor.

At the set of sun the chief called all his braves about him and made this proclamation: "As the sun sets on the 'Land of Many Waters' so shall it be called 'Imnaha.' To you my son, shall be given the horse of your choice, and over the land of Imnaha you shall rule."

To this day the advent of the white man has not completely eclipsed the presence of the red man in this land. The Indian still hunts and fishes in its wild fastnesses and the nature-loving white still feels the charm of his presence. So today the "Land of Many Waters" is called IMNAHA.
