Health Talks

JENNER

The conquest of smallpox stands to the eternal credit of Edward Jenner, a student of the great surgeon, John Hunter. In a sense, Jenner's discovery, like so many other great discoveries, was an accident.

Jenner once overheard a milk maid saying, "I cannot take smallpox because I have had cow pox." This observation so deeply impressed him that after consulting Hunter, he set himself to making a careful and deliberate study of the relation of cow pox to smallpox.

By a series of clear, consistent experiments in which he artificially produced cow pox in a number of persons, including his little son, he was enabled to demonstrate that persons vaccinated with cow pox were immune or resistant to smallpox.
