GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS

"I have never believed that our form of government could satisfactorily solve economic problems by direct action, that is, successfully conduct business institutions. The government can and must cure abuses.

"What the government can do best is to encourage and assist in the creation and development of institutions controlled by our citizens and evolved by themselves from their own needs and their experience and directed in a sense of trusteeship of public interest."

These statements were made in an address delivered a short time ago by President Hoover, and the great majority of people, regardless of their political faith, are in agreement with them. Our government was founded on the principle that the government ought not to do for the people the things which they can best do for themselves. We have prospered and grown into a great nation by the application of these principles. And yet, despite the fact that they are still held by the great majority of the American people, there is a constant agitation on the part of a well organized small minority to make the people wards of the government, by constantly increasing the power and authority of the federal government over business, with the evident aim of building up a paternalistic government in the United States.

The paternalistic idea of government is of course, the "father and son" idea, with the state serving as the provident father and the individual as the trusting child. If this sort of government is effective at all it can only be effective where the government is an autocracy. Just as the parent is the dictator of the family policies, so long as the children are unable to take care of themselves, so the government must have dictatorial power.

But in the United States we have had, since the founding of the republic a representative government in which the people rule and have the final say. In this form of government the paternalistic idea has no part. The best government, so far as the economic life of the people is concerned, is that which permits the people to work out their own domestic problems in line with the idea quoted from President Hoover in the quotation above.

FOUR-SQUARE

Poise is a possession of the conqueror. It is something physical. Workmen on high structures, riding swinging beams or leaning against wind-pressure, acquire the art of poise.

Poise is also associated with our mental equipment. People out of balance mentally are not able to carry the load that balanced people can carry. They are crushed under the responsibilities of life. The world trials become too much for them.

A considerable amount of poor work, both physical and mental, results from the lack of poise. People deficient in this quality are easily surprised and thus easily defeated.

A man may be a woodchopper, teacher, merchant or any one of a multitude of callings, but the demands of his work in whatever line call for accuracy and power, and therefore poise. We have frequently seen those who change from one idea to another, from task to task, from one friend to another. Do we consider them persons of real power?

Early in life we should cultivate habits that will develop poise so that we may be successful both physically and mentally.

The things that man may secure at the expense of self-respect are not worth the cost.

In Washington

By Herbert H. Hume
WASHINGTON — Under the dome of the capitol there is a small but to which comes daily probably as numerous an assemblage of correspondents as can be found anywhere.

William T. Hearst, chief of the house of representatives, received this literary throng of correspondents from individuals in all parts of the world are expected there, and it is up to him to see that each piece is disposed of in some fashion. Thus the other day, for example, Hearst took from his mail box an envelope addressed to "the Government of the United States" in "case White House." Under the name of a publisher, he found a publisher's card, and he made the impression of any of all members of congress.

"Remember," the card said, "Page 10 is one of my regular correspondents." He had a half dozen of these cards, and he said to himself, "This card says that all—no matter how serious their inquiries may be—

SAFETY VALVE
And Page regards his mail box as a good thing. He thinks of it as a sort of safety valve. "It does them good to get it off their chest," he says. "And there is always the possibility that something can be done."
A man once sent him $30 with the request that a gun be purchased for him so that he could shoot some one. Page informed the congressman of the district, who got in touch with police officials and found the writer was dangerously demented.
Just recently he found in his mail box a packet resembling an infernal machine. Carefully he opened a letter inserted under the cord. It said that since the sender was unable to match his wit with congress in shooting the animal, he was sending it along.
Packed in sawdust, modeled with the greatest care and skill, reposed a little effigy of a charging bull.

Education and the State

By Dr. Arnold Bennett Hall
President, University of Oregon

Editor's note: This is the second of a series of four articles written by students of the University of Oregon. Others will follow in regular intervals.

As habits of critical thinking are essential to an effective democracy, so are they essential to the intelligent planning of one's own life. How many students have drifted into certain professions merely because their parents happened to be so engaged or because their friends were or through some other accident or caprice? How many young people fail to accomplish successfully the tasks they undertake merely because they do not make any serious attempt to analyze the nature of their task, their own aptitudes, abilities, and analyze the nature of their own efforts?

Habits of critical thinking, of accurate observation applied to the commonplace affairs of life would yield dividends both of material and spiritual happiness that could scarcely be exaggerated.

Problem Recognized
The University recognizes this problem and is trying to reorganize its courses and ideas and teaching methods so that they will train students in habits of critical thinking rather than in merely memorizing the contents of a course. The University is now carrying on experiments in the relative efficiency of different methods of attaining this end. A good deal of attention is being given by certain branches to the development of the "problem" or "project" method. There the emphasis is upon problem solving. The students are given certain problems as practical and realistic as they can be made. These problems require analysis, careful thinking and the exercise of sound judgment in the application of principles. Students are encouraged not to accept their textbooks as Gospel truth, but to attack it critically, looking to detect any possible flaws and trying to use it as a means of developing their own critical powers.

The spirit we are trying to generate is more the spirit of curiosity, of research, or back-finding than it is of memorizing the statements of authorities, however profound and valuable they may be. This sometimes occasions discussion in the home. Under these principles of instruction students often begin to find that they differ with political or economic or social theories that they have held before. It is a test of the parents' good breadth of vision and real devotion to their children when they come home from the University and begin to differ with parents about some of the current problems of life. Recently a parent said to me, "Your University has ruined my child. It has changed his politics. He now differs with us on many problems where we know we are right."

If this parent were correct, then he should not have sent his son to the University, because it is the business of a university not to teach the student to think as the professors think or to think as the parents think, but to think independently, to think honestly, and to seek the truth fearlessly. When this is done, if the students have any individuality of their own, it is almost inevitable that they will find themselves in occasional conflict with some of the traditional thinking of their parents.

Discussion Urged
This should be an occasion for mutual counsel and intelligent discussion in the family circle. The habit of thinking that has been established at the University should be encouraged. Mistaken views, the result of an inadequate or an immature conception of the facts, may be righted, not by the authority of the home, but by the persuasive power of evidence and reason.

It is difficult to get young people to observe critically and to analyze accurately, and if the parents will, in the spirit of friendly criticism, encourage such critical discussions they can make a great contribution to the efficiency of the University in striving to train its students in the habits of intelligent thinking and critical analysis.

The second intellectual element in training one's individual resources for the problems of life is the development of a spirit of tolerance, of intellectual integrity, of objective open-mindedness. Merely to develop habits of critical analysis alone tends frequently to develop a certain cynical or disparaging attitude toward life. With the habits of critical analysis and thinking must go a genuine love of truth. We must motivate youth with a fine sense of intellectual integrity. Otherwise, he may become clever, rather than profound. He may become smart, rather than wise. He may be brilliantly instructive without being helpfully constructive.

That is the reason we like to insist upon the spirit of research as a characteristic of our undergraduate instruction, as well as a necessary element in our graduate work. That is the reason we try to arrange our courses in order to stimulate the curiosity of the student. We like to visualize his study as giving it the dignity of intellectual discovery. When he takes a problem and finally works his way to a solution, has the thrill of intellectual accomplishment, and achieves the enthusiasm of the scholar who seeks to discover new facts of life and thought and to bring them to the world, then he is beginning to reverence truth. He is then ready to understand the dignity of intellectual integrity.

Hoss Opposed to A Referendum on New Police Bill

SALEM, March 17 (AP)—Hal E. Hoss, secretary of state, yesterday announced he was unopposed to a referendum on the state police bill, and had discouraged such a move in Portland over the past week. Before the board of control meeting last yesterday, Hoss stated he did not believe such a referendum would now be started, although a motion for one has been current in some cities of the state.

In making the announcement, Hoss stated that people opposing the measure had sought his support for a referendum, but that he had not only discouraged such action, but had issued notices to every member of the state traffic force that any participation in a referendum move against the bill would result in his immediate dismissal.

Hoss opposed the measure before the legislature, but since the decision approval given the administration bill by both houses, he said he would not oppose it further. He said he had done what he deemed his duty in voicing his opposition prior to passage of the bill. He will now cooperate with the administration in effecting the police system after August 1.

A referendum against the system would delay its effectiveness for two years, while in the meantime, due to uncertainty, no progress could be made in any of the various departments incorporated in the bill, Hoss explained. No preliminary petition for a referendum has been filed, and the secretary of state was confident no further action would be taken.

The state police system, was provided by the state legislature, includes the traffic department, now under the supervision of the secretary of state, the prohibition enforcement, fire warden, fish and game law enforcement officials, and under one head, to be appointed by the governor, and directly responsible to him.
