UNBREAKABLE DISHES
By Alice Johnson Peale

In all habits training it is well to bear in mind that the child eventually must learn to handle himself in the midst of an adult environment. It saves him a good deal of difficult unlearning if correct habits are set up from the start.

For the little child who is just learning to eat, brightly colored enamel cups and bowls seem at first to be the most satisfactory kind of dishes since they are both attractive and unbreakable.

Sooner or later, however, the child must learn to eat from ordinary breakable dishes. If he has been trained from the start to handle dishes with care, he has already established habits which later, when he is promoted to a seat at the family dinner table, will prevent his breaking mother's best dinner plates and glassware through sheer awkwardness.

All things considered, it is probably best to let the child from the beginning eat from ordinary china dishes. Certainly, he will break a few of them in the process of learning how to use them, but the damage isn't apt to be serious.

When the two-year-old breaks a dish and sees by his mother's face that this is something to be sorry for, he will try to be more careful in the future. At the same time he learns that dishes dropped or thrown upon the floor will break, a useful bit of information which he would not thus early acquire if he were given only enamel dishes.

The penalties attached to breakage and destruction should be just enough to make the child feel that they are a cause for regret. Brief but not unkindly evidence of disapproval is usually enough to teach this lesson.

Chapter 31
WAY'S HOPE DEFERRED

THE thief?

Had he returned in search of further loot, to see whether his victim were dead or not, to recover something incriminating that he had dropped?

Or had he perhaps seen me kneeling by the body, and fearing that I had seen sufficient of him to be able to identify him, had returned to silence me?

Might he have turned about and followed me with a view to robbing me as he had robbed this unfortunate old man?

The policeman sprang for his pistol and shot me. I delivered a tremendous blow that was to finish the fight. Almost simultaneously we struck and, as my left arm broke, so did the policeman's jaw. As I staggered back, he dropped without a sound, and lay like a sack of flour, inert and motionless.

Drawing a deep breath, I stopped back, turned and sprinted, thankful beyond measure that no sound of following footsteps came. But my thankfulness was premature.

Scarcely was I well into my stride before there was a loud bang.

A heavy blow struck my leg and I stumbled.

Another bang and a searing, tearing pain passed through my chest, and I fell to the ground.

Again, a third bang, and I felt as though a sledge-hammer had hit me on the head.

The policeman had won after all by a legitimate feat.

Guessing that I would instantly run, he had lain still until my back was turned. He had then sprung to where the pistol lay, and had shot me thrice.

I had no compunction about hitting him as hard and as often as I could, in return for the cowardly blow he had struck me with his club while I knelt with my back turned to him; and he now had equally little compunction about kicking me on the head twice, with all his strength, as I lay wounded and bleeding upon the ground.

"You make a move," he growled, and I'll give you another bullet, just where I'll do you most good, Mr. Thug."

I made no reply, for I was fast losing consciousness, and believed that I was dying—dying in bitterness at the thought that Rosemary's murderer would now go unpunished.

I have a dim remembrance of being roughly dragged along the ground, and dropped beneath the lamp-post beside the body of the murdered man.

As the policeman drew his pistol I struck again with all my strength; and even as I did so,
