BRADSTREET'S REPORT ISSUED

The opinion in the case, declared an unusual one before the supreme court, was handed down by Chief Justice Henry J. Beaton. The right of cities and towns to regulate the operation of fire cars and to charge a fee was sustained in the opinion of the supreme court in the case of the Union company against the city of Portland. The suit asked an injunction restraining the city from enforcing the ordinance affecting fire cars. The Multnomah county court found for the defendant, and its verdict was affirmed in an opinion by Justice Campbell.

Chats With Parents

AN OUNCE OF PREVENTION By Alice Judson Peale

A seven-year-old had spent the better part of the day outdoing himself in being disobedient, loud and unkind to his mother. He flouted her requests (she gave no commands), he criticized her behavior, he called everybody, including strangers, all the bad names he could think of, and staged two or three first-rate tantrums in as many hours.

It was amazing that one child could have had the energy for so much misbehavior. Through it all his mother remained gentle, ignoring as much as she could, protesting mildly now and then, and occasionally sounding just a little petulant.

But there was a climax. She was driving, and it was necessary for her to turn the car in a narrow and dangerous place. The child, partly in fear and partly as an expression of his attitude throughout the day, began calling her down violently for clumsiness and recklessness.

When the car was once more safely on the road, his mother turned and slapped him soundly.

Violent punishment often is inflicted after some such prelude. The child is permitted to get out of hand, to violate every possible rule of behavior, and then, when the nervous tension becomes too much, he is slapped, spanked or shaken.

In child training, as in other matters, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

In this instance the punishment served only as a vent to the mother's irritation. It taught the child nothing, since he had misbehaved for so long with impunity. Indeed, it was not an hour afterwards that he was up to his old tricks again. Whatever is forbidden should be so thoroughly forbidden that the very first indication of disobedience is met with an effective check. WHEN MOTHER VISITS By Alice Judson Peale Resident aunts and convenient grandmothers now are less frequent than they used to be and often a mother must either take her child visiting or stay home herself. The little child who is taken along to a grown-up luncheon or tea party usually finds himself at first the center of just that sort of attention and comment that the wise mother is so eager to avoid for him. A little later when the conversation turns to grown-up matters the child, feeling himself left out in the cold, makes a nuisance of himself partly in order to attract attention and partly because he is bored with nothing to do. Both these undesirable results may to some extent be avoided. Where it is possible for the child to play out of doors, it is well to take along some toy, even though it may be inconvenient to carry. With a plaything he may spend wholesome hours out of doors, instead of being required to amuse himself in the midst of adult social ability. When outdoor play is not possible, play materials for quiet indoor are helpful. A pad and a box of crayons may easily be slipped into mother's handbag. Puzzles, mosaic blocks or a picture book, while a little more bulky, will also provide entertainment. The older child may enjoy taking along a book of his own. A little girl who is interested in sewing or who has learned the art of knitting rears on a spool may take such handiwork along with her and feel that she is quite a part of the social occasion. Such quiet preoccupation protects the child from the unwelcome attentions which tend to either make him show off or to feel self-conscious and shy.
