Chapter 12

APPRAISING EYES

NORA sat in the old city station, her bags huddled about her feet. From time to time she glanced up at the clock and then with apprehension at the station doors. How many times in the last hour had she turned with a trembling lip, to see if some stranger passed her. She had thought of running away, of refusing to meet Nicholas, but she knew that would be to face him, and knowing it she sat on. Would it be Jon who came to meet her? Or that step-ladder, Damon?

She wondered miserably if she could go through with it. But she would. She must. There was only one thing she wanted now, the old house, quiet and peace. She did not want to come alive again; for that would hurt too much. But a sky and a garden and trees. They couldn't hurt you.

No one had come for her. Perhaps no one ever would. The doctor had sent the wireless for her, to Jon and to her own people.

Then glancing up, she saw Jonathon Thayer. She would have known him anywhere though it was five years since she had seen him. The pale clear-cut face, the lips a little insolent, and that air of cold reserve.

She looked at him again, glancing uncertainly about, studying the people. She waited. He would smile when he saw her; he would remember her at once. For the first time a little throb of feeling seemed to break through the ice at her heart. He met her eyes as he came forward, hesitated, stood before her—

"I'm Jonathon Thayer. Are you?"

"Yes," she answered almost inaudibly.

He had not recognized her. At first she could not believe it. She understood his expression. It was one of horrified dismay. His eyes raked her in silent criticism. She still wore the blue suit and scarlet blouse.

"I hope you haven't been waiting long," Jon was saying. "I was out when the wire came saying on what train you would arrive."

He was studying her with quick glances. What a slim long-legged little creature she was with that white face held under a fierce control. She could have borne his pity, but his frank dismay was unbearable. She disliked him violently.

"Of course you must have something to eat first," he said.

He acted as though nothing had happened, as he asked for her trunk check and found that she had no trunk. There was only one thing she would not part with. That was Nicholas' painting of the peasant woman; she clung to it. In spite of his offer to have it put with her bags.

But she saw that although his expression was cold, his eyelids were swollen from weeping. She relented a little toward him. How could he be expected to remember her after five years?

"Could you walk a block or two? There's quite a small place, but perhaps it would be more quiet there."

He was taking her there because he was ashamed of her. She hoped she would never have to see him again after this meeting. What it meant that everything was swept away, her dream of security in the old house in the country? Nothing mattered but that she should leave this heartless man who did not show by a single change of expression that he had suffered.

He walked beside her to the revolving doors, pushed them open and joined her on the sidewalk.

As she stood there something happened to her. She was alive after a long, slow death. Her eyes swam with tears. It was good to be alive, even to suffer. She turned to look at Jonathon Thayer, but he was staring ahead, waiting for the traffic
