Church was shot down on the night of October 26, 1930. A gun bearing Reding's finger prints was found in a well near the house. The state contended Church was shot with robbery as a motive.

Outline Program For Control Of Cancer in U. S.

By Howard W. Blakeslee
(Associated Press Science Editor)

NEW YORK, May 27 (AP)—A "practical" method of beginning to reduce cancer deaths in this country was made public yesterday in a report by the directors of the American Society for the Control of Cancer.

This may be done, they state, by establishment of special cancer institutes, hospitals, services and clinics. The institutes should be affiliated with universities, and include in their programs education, research and treatment in the field of cancer control.

"It does not seem too much to hope," says the report, "that the further development of cancer clinics throughout the country, and their coordination through the American College of Surgeons may raise the standards of treatment of cancer, and as a practical result begin to reduce the frightful mortality from this disease."

The report recounts an improvement in earlier reporting of the beginnings of cancer.

"The general lack of knowledge regarding the significance of early signs," it states, "the failure to appreciate the disastrous results of delayed diagnosis and treatment, the inability to distinguish between good and bad treatment, and the feeling that the affliction is a stigma, are each and all responsible for a vast amount of unnecessary suffering and death.

"It is encouraging to note, however, that the situation in this respect has definitely improved in this country during the past decade. Physicians report that an increasing proportion of cases are coming to them earlier in the stage of the disease, with a resulting higher percentage of cures. The public is becoming more familiar with the beginning signs of cancer; the subject is discussed with greater frankness."

Private agencies have caused this improvement, with a few governmental bodies assisting in recent years, says the report. It adds that there is room for wise investment of additional funds in this part of the work.

In the past 25 years scientific research has uncovered much important cancer information "all of it useful in clearing the way and laying the foundation for further advance."

COLUMBIA, S. C., May 27 (AP) — Norman Blakely, 18-year-old negro, convicted of killing a chain gang guard, was electrocuted yesterday at the state penitentiary here, while Mrs. G. C. Howard, daughter of the slain man, looked on.

Blakely killed D. M. Garrett, the chain gang guard, with a shovel while trying to escape.

Mexican Soldiers Turn Gold Miners

MEXICO CITY, May 27 (AP) — Charges that troops detailed to guard a recently discovered gold field at El Tambor in the state of Sinaloa were themselves digging gold and driving out the prospectors were made yesterday by representatives of a group claiming to be the discoverers of the field.

The troops are shipping the gold to the United States to be sold, the prospectors charged.

Mother Is Charged With Baby's Death

ALHAMBRA, Cal., May 27 (AP) — Mrs. Violet Wallick, 36, was charged with first degree murder in connection with the death Saturday of her baby, discovered badly burned in an incinerator at the Wallick home. The infant was found still alive in the incinerator by Mrs. Wallick's mother, but it died several hours later. Police say Mrs. Wallick declared she believed the baby dead when she wrapped it in newspapers and touched a match to it.

Seek Parole For Six Men Now In Washington Pen

WALLA WALLA, Wash., May 27 (AP) —The parole board of the state penitentiary yesterday was considering a renewal of requests for the parole of six men serving sentences in connection with the death of several American Legion men in the Armistice day, 1919, riots in Centralia.

James Taylor, president of the state federation of labor, said he was repeating a plea made in a state labor convention resolution two years ago that the men be paroled on the ground the legal minimum for second degree murder should be 10 years. The men have already served a longer time.

A delegation of church members also appeared before the board, asking for their release on the basis of a report filed last September by investigators for the Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish churches.

The board received a petition signed by Austin county residents requesting the release of Eugene Barnett, one of the prisoners, sentenced to serve from 25 to 40 years. Barnett's wife is a resident of Clarkston in that county. The petitions ask that Barnett be paroled to H. C. Hartung, state representative from the county.

GORILLA SUSPENDED

CHICAGO, May 27 (AP) — Gorilla Jones, Akron, Ohio, welterweight, was fined $1,000 and suspended for six months by the Illinois State Athletic commission yesterday for his indifferent showing in his 10-round fight with Bucky LaLwless of Syracuse, N. Y., at the Chicago stadium Monday night.

The fact an increasing number of phone calls are being made at the White House should convince you that the Republicans are quite a busy party.

MAD PURSUIT

BY JESSIE DOUGLAS FOX

SYNOPSIS: Nora Lake is a suicide victim's widow a few hours after she marries to escape from her troubled life as the motherless daughter of Julian Lake. She reproaches herself for not having secured Nicholas Thayer's plan to jump from the ship's deck after the loveless marriage which gave her a claim on his home near Albany. At the station there Nicholas' brother, Jonathon meets her with a scarcely concealed contempt. He observes her dismay at finding her aunt, Emily Durant, her cousin Frances, with two children, deserted by their father, and the crippled Hallie, living in a drab home and not the mansion Julian had pictured. The next day, Nora awaits the coming of Jonathon to take her to the old Thayer place.

Chapter 15

A RIDE WITH JON

DESPITE Jonathon's coldness, Nora did want Nicholas' people—Jonathon, his step-sister, Damon, and her father—to like her. "More than anything else in the world"—she had told Hallie, there in the attic room where she had spent her first night.

Nora came over and stood beside Hallie, who was looking down at her hands. She thought this crippled cousin of hers was very ugly, but she found something in the face that interested her. It was not one of those faces which have nothing to say, but the lines, the pain, the laughter wrinkles about the eyes were like the map of a strange country.

"Your hands are beautiful," Nora said when she saw Hallie had observed her scrutiny.

"But useless," Hallie said sardonically. "Here I am day after day letting the others work to support me. Mother giving music lessons in all kinds of weather Fran working all day in an office while I play watch dog at home." She sat frowning.

"But some day perhaps I will do something," she said with a kind of grim purpose.

When she was dressed Nora went downstairs. As she reached the last step, the door of the front parlor burst open, and the young doctor with his hat in his hand clutching a bag, with the barest nod to Nora, rushed out of his office.

"Someone must be dying!" Nora cried to Hallie.

"Don't worry. He's just showing the neighborhood how busy he is," Hallie explained, smiling, "he's not had a single patient—except Pete Baker, the dog who hurt his leg—since he's been here. But twice a day he takes his bag and rushes around the block at break-neck speed.

Nora insisted on going down to get her breakfast alone, though Hallie offered to crawl down after her.

The basement floor contained the dining room and kitchen. Nothing more dreary than this kitchen could be imagined, with its small barred window that looked out on the back yard.

A gas stove stood against one wall. A table centered the kitchen and a glass-doored cupboard held r ws of blue plates and cups. The kitchen table was scrubbed to a satiny whiteness and even the little stove by the wall had a black, gleaming surface.

Nora sat munching toast and drinking warmed-over coffee at the kitchen table. She could barely wait until the time Jon would come for her. She was eager to leave the little red brick house. Her own people could not give her security. They themselves were insecure; any day they might leave this dreary street and go to live somewhere else. She did not see that their interests were interlocked nor that their love was a stronghold against the world.

She heard the noon whistles blow and down the steps from the back yard two children came running. Alice came straight up to the kitchen table and observed Nora minutely.

"I like you," she pronounced after this scrutiny.

She was an exquisite creature. She seemed to rise out of her white dress like a flower. She had beautifully spaced gray eyes beneath fine black eyebrows. Her skin was fresh and delicate. Her fair hair shone about her face like the petals of a daffodil.

Four-year-old Dickie did not notice the newcomer. He was chasing a small brown dog around the kitchen. At last Dickie captured him and began to hug him lovingly while the dog bore it with an infinite wheezing patience.

"He loves Petie Baker," Alice said placidly, watching the dog roll out of Dickie's arms.

Hallie came hobbling down to get the children's lunch and Nora noticed how skillfully she managed to get about on her crippled feet.

When the children had left for school it was time to think about the afternoon. Nora, looking over her clothes, was struck with despair. The blue skirt was shrunken from the salt air, the beret had an old look and the scarlet blouse was a mass of wrinkles.

She dressed very carefully and went to find Hallie. Hallie looked up from her sewing.

"Look at me, I look awful!" Nora cried in despair.

Hallie hesitated and said nothing.

"I can't go, that's all. Oh, Hallie, what shall I do?"

Hallie began to jerk open drawers.

"I have a pair of gloves—someone gave them to me and haven't worn them yet—here they are. And I think Fran has a new pair of silk stockings. Will this blouse fit you? Give me your skirt. I'll press it."

Nora began to dress again in Fran's white blouse with its round childish collar, to draw on Fran's silk stockings, and try on the gloves. Hallie came back with the skirt just as the bell rung.

"Oh Hallie, I'm not ready!"

She watched Hallie hobble from the room again, heard her cautious descent of the stairs. She was cold with nervousness; she could picture Jon and Hallie in the back parlor, Jon restless and impatient and Hallie observing him with her sardonic eyes.

When she was dressed she decided she had never looked worse. But she would show Jon Thayer that she thought nothing of his opinion. She might be poor, but she must never forget she was Julian Lake's daughter. But her heart beat thickly as she went toward the back parlor.

Jon was standing with an open book in his hands as Nora came in. He put it down and took her chilly fingers in his for a moment.

"Are you feeling rested?" he asked indifferently.

He stood out against the background of the shabby room, young and arrogant. His deep-set eyes, neither green nor gray, rested on her. She saw his strong nose and insolent lips, and she wondered what his arrogance might conceal.

Nora turned to say good-by to Hallie as she went down the steps beside Jon to his car. He seemed anxious to hurry her away not because he wanted to learn about Nicholas but in order to get the ordeal over.

He slid in the clutch of the low foreign car and drove down the street recklessly. There was a quality of daring in his driving that appealed to Nora.

"Driving too fast for you?" Jon asked.

"You couldn't drive too fast for me."

Jon turned to glance at her and looked quickly away. He said nothing more. At length Nora saw the blue gleam of the river and the river meadows yellow with wild mustard.

He was taking her to his home because it was a duty, a painful duty he did not trouble to hide. She felt that he did not like her, not with passive indifference but with an active and violent feeling.

At last Jon turned into an old carriage drive that wound through poplar trees toward the house. Far back on lawns that seemed to flow like green waves it stood on a rise of ground. The house was of a pale brick, stained by rain and sun and wind to gray. Slender white pillars outlined the piazza. It was one of those old Dutch houses imbedded in its lands and fields and woods.

Jon said, as they climbed the stone steps, "You can see the river from here," as though she were a casual visitor who had come to see the view.

The trees except for the poplars beside the driveway had been cleared away from the house, so that the grass dipped and rolled down a gentle slope toward the river.

The room to which Jon took her ran the full length of the house. The feeling that the house gave her of being grounded in tradition was centered here. The white wainscoting, the high ceilings and wide fireplace, the mellow old furniture covered in a design of birds and flowers gave the room an austere beauty. On the bookshelves and tables were bowls of white lilacs.

She sat waiting for Damon, rigid with nervousness. This old house had made her feel like a tramp who had made her way in by mistake. She began to unwrap Nicholas' painting of the old peasant woman and when she looked up she saw Damon.

(Copyright, 1930, Jessie Douglas Fox)

Nora hesitates tomorrow, weighing Damon's embittered invitation. So much depends on a word from Jon!
