

Chats With Parents

REFUSING TO LEARN
By Alice Judson Peale

A 6-year-old, obviously bright, and happy child, who plays and converses with her mother, refuses to be taught anything. She absolutely refuses to count, to recognize her letters, to learn verses or do any other of the dozens of things her parents would like.

Aside from the question of the fitness of these tasks, it is interesting to observe that she learns much but refuses to be taught anything at all.

This fact is all the more striking since she really is a very happy and good little girl who loves her father and mother and is very much loved by them.

Ordinarily love of one's teacher is the first step in being taught, but this child refuses to be taught by the people she loves most.

It happens that she is an only child whose parents associate chiefly with childless people. It seems likely that the explanation of her curious behavior is found here.

She finds herself a child in a world of grown-ups, and she resents it. Her refusal to accept definite teaching is her protest against the inferiority of her position.

Recently an effort has been made to give her regular hours of play with other children. At first she was stand-offish and superior, but already she shows an increasing eagerness to be with them.

Her conversation at the family dinner table no longer is so much the precocious comment of a small child in a sophisticated world. Instead she tells of happenings during play hours and of the other children.

It is likely that if her parents can resist the temptation to try any more teaching at home she cheerfully will accept the situation and, as a member of a class, will learn as all other children learn.
