War Department's Plans Do Not Include Food, Fuel Administration

By Rodney Dutcher (NEA Service Writer)

WASHINGTON — The war department's plans for the "next war" do not contemplate another powerful food administration or fuel administration. Neither is it proposed that the government take over the railroads, as it did in the last war, unless full government control seems to become unavoidable.

Food and fuel will be handled by a director of war industry, who would serve on a dominant advisory war council with the secretaries of war and navy, a director of selective service, director of public relations and an administrator of labor.

The army has worked out a definite plan for wartime operation of railroads, under which a central committee of railroad officials would be able to put the rail system at the disposal of the government under unified management within 24 hours.

Plan Staff of Experts

The director of war industry obviously will be a most important person and if you happen to be convinced that we'll be having a major war before long you might have some fun guessing who he will turn out to be. He will be appointed by the president and will act as his confidential representative. He will function with headquarters here, aided by a staff of experts engaged, as the war department envisages their job, in "continuous studies of such matters as price movements and their causes, substitutes for critical materials, conservation and business practices." The main body of his office will consist of two branches—one to co-ordinate demand, or requirements, and the other to co-ordinate supply, dealing with industry, as a whole and its efforts to meet the requirements. The branch which will handle organization of demand includes representatives of the army and navy along with civilians. Under the director, in a so-called industrial branch, there will be a co-ordinator of war industry assisted by an industrial advisory board consisting of several prominent industrialists who will be drafted by the president for official government service.

Each member of the advisory board will be assigned general supervision over a group of war service committees. Industries, groups of industries or component parts of industries will be asked to select for themselves executive committees and to empower them with definite control over the industries or groups represented so that they may act on designated matters connected with the emergency. Any association or organization might appoint a war service committee, the war department says, but they will represent primarily manufacturers, distributors, transportation, labor, power and shippers. The war service committee will not be governmental organizations as the advisory board will be, but will exercise only the powers delegated to them by the industries which elect them.

Speed Essential

To insure speed of organization when a big war emergency comes the war department will keep a list of names of men specially qualified, so that the director of war industry and his principal assistants may be promptly chosen by the president. Officers engaged in peacetime study of the wartime industrial problems will be ready to step in and facilitate matters of office organization, plans and specifications at any moment. Meanwhile, the army industrial college is making intensive studies involved in the prompt organization of industry for war emergency.

Before the war department submitted its plans to the war policies commission there was considerable discussion of the question of conscripting labor in wartime—a measure strongly opposed by the unions. Thus interest attaches to the proposed functions of the "administrator of labor." General Douglas MacArthur, chief of staff, says enforced labor would not be supported by public opinion or be conducive to morale and efficiency. But the full co-operation of labor is anticipated and the war plans are professedly designed to "protect labor from oppression under color of emergency" as well as to guide it into useful channels and keep it therein as far as possible. "Labor control" will be based entirely, it is promised, on voluntary co-operation.

TINY WATER "SCAVENGERS" HELP DESTROY POLLUTION

WASHINGTON (AP)—Tiny animal or vegetable organisms serve as "scavengers" in impure water as buzzards act as scavengers on land.

The organisms are known as "plankton." Their presence in water is a sign the water is polluted. Plankton disappear when the water is purified, says the United States public health service.

Vegetable plankton destroy bacteria by a "gas attack" of oxygen. Animal plankton attack bacteria by actually feeding on them or on the by-products of the bacteria that poison the water.
