Building Cleaner Falls 14 Stories, Lands Perfectly!

CINCINNATI, Dec. 9 (AP)—Charles Holbert, 28, building cleaner, fell 14 stories Tuesday when he slipped off a scaffold while calmly puffing a cigarette while awaiting an ambulance because he made a perfect landing on a coil of rope.

Falling head over heels, Holbert broke his somersault by frantically thrusting his arms and legs—one of his hands coming in contact with a scaffold rope.

Holbert then performed a sliding act until his hand became blistered. He lost his hold and started some more somersaults which ended on a coil of hemp suspending the scaffold.

At a hospital, physicians said he suffered contusions of the right elbow and back and a burned left palm.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Nice and daughter, Eva, were shopping in Baker last Saturday.

M. Loree and son, of Cove, were here Saturday with a truck load of apples and vegetables.

SUNSET PASS by Zane Grey

SYNOPSIS: A trail strewn with ruin's trails towards Sunset Pass, where Trueman Rock, a cowboy, is to find work with Gabe Preston's outfit. There is some mystery about Preston's outfit, and he is interested in a connection with cattle rustling. But Rock can't trace the rustlers down, and he is interested in locating at Sunset Pass, because he has fallen in love with Thirya Preston's daughter. He is told that he probably will find work because no one stays with Preston long. One cause for this is the savagery of Ash Preston, a son, who has been known to cripple cowboys who looked over at Thirya. Ash has a bad reputation. It is believed that he killed the first cowboy who was on his way to Sunset Pass. Rock, who has returned to Wagonwong after six years, expects to see his old friend, the sheriff over on old man Right. A rider overtakes Rock on route to Sunset Pass.

"Well, considerin' we're old friends, I won't take offense," drawled Rock. "How you doin'?"

"Been on my feet these two years," returned Pringle, with satisfaction. "Got three thousand head of stock. An' sellin' eight hundred head this fall."

"I'm sure tickled. Losin' much stock?"

"Some. But not enough to rare about. Though I'm agreed with cattlemen who know the range that there's more rustlin' than for some years past."

"Is that so?"

"Queer rustlin', too. You lose a few head of steers an' then you never hear of anyone seemin' hide no hair of them again."

Chapter 10

ADVICE—OR WARNING

"I KNEWED you was a stranger round Wagonwong," said the other, grinning.

"Sure I am, lately. But I was here years ago," Rock said.

"Before my time, shore. 'Cause I'd remembered you. What's your handle?"

"Trueman Rock, late of Texas."

"Pears to me I've heard that name, somewhere. Wait, I'm glad to meet you. I'm Hal Roberts. An' if you don't tie up with Preston, come back an' try Spangler."

Rock thanked him and asked questions about the range. Soon afterward the cowboy bade him goodbye and turned off. As Rock passed on he drew away from the dry-farming levels and the wastes of cut-over land, to get out into the desert proper.

In due time he reached the top of a slope and there halted the horses to spend a few moments in revelling in the well-remembered country.

A thirty-mile gulf yawned wide and shallow, a yellow-green sea of desert grass and sage, which sloped into ridge on ridge of cedar and white grass. The length of the valley both east and west extended beyond the limit of vision, and here began the vast cattle range that made the town of Wagonwong possible. Rock's trained eye saw cattle everywhere, though not in large herds. The rough country commenced some fifteen miles or more farther on. Sunset Pass and its environs were not in view, nor even the mountain ranges that were visible from the town.

An hour's ride down the slow incline brought Rock into a verdant swale of fifty acres, fresh with its varied shades of green, surrounding a pretty ranch house. Here Adam Pringle had lived.

Rock saw a boy leading a horse, then a man at work under an open shed. Rock halted. Whereupon the farmer started off leisurely, then quickened his steps. It was Adam—a stalwart, middle-aged, weatherbeaten soldier.

"True Rock, or I'm a born sinner!" shouted Pringle, before he was even near Rock.

"Howdy, Adam! How's the old-timer?" returned Rock.

"I knowed that heas. An' I shore knowed you lost from the way you straddled him. How air you? This is plumb a surprise. Get down an' come in."

"Haven't time, Adam. I'm rustlin' along to mink camp below. . . . Adams, you're lookin' good. I see you've made this homestead go."

"Never seen you look any better. There's a heas an' a maddie you're ridin'. You always was hell on them. What you been?"

"Texas."

"Rockon you heard about Cas Sew and bein' popped off, an' you ride back in the old stampin' grounds?"

"Adam, I didn't know Cas was dead till I got to Wagonwong. Guess I was homesick."

"What you goin'?"

"Sunset Pass."

"Cowboy, if you want work, pile right off heas."

"Thanks, Adam, but I've got a hankerin' for wilder country. I'll try Preston. Think he'll take me on?"

"Shore. But don't ask him."

"Why not?"

"I'm advisin' you—not talkin'," returned the rancher, with a sharp gleam in his eye. "You know me, True."

"Used to, pretty well, Adam. And I'm sort of flustered at your advisin' me that way," replied Rock, keenly searching the other's face.

"Stay away from Sunset Pass."

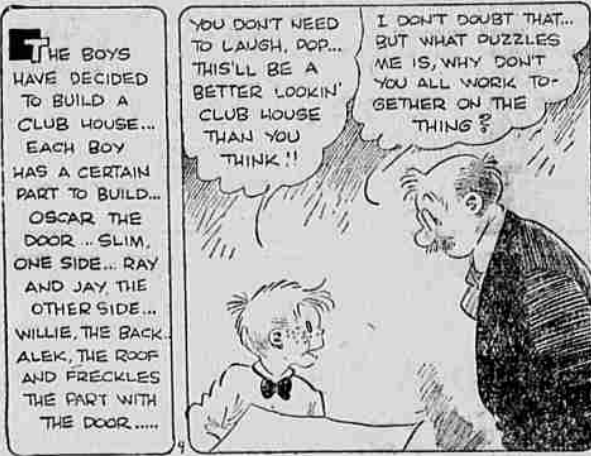

"Adam, I just never could take advice," drawled Rock. "Much obliged, though."

"Cowboy, you may need a job bad, an' you shore always hankered for wild range. But it ain't that."

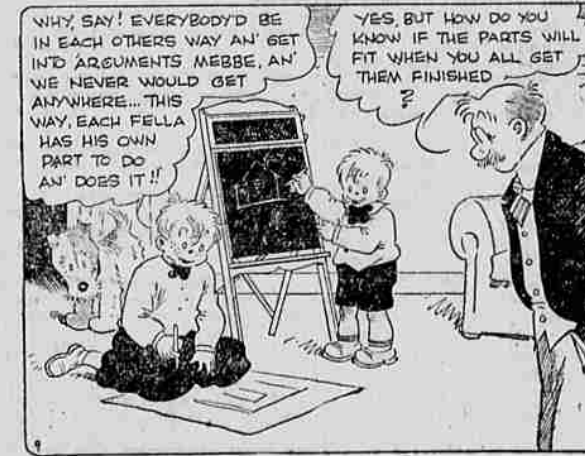

"What you aimin' at, Adam?" asked Rock, with a laugh.

"I ain't aimin', True. I'm tellin' you. It's that tow-headed lass of Preston's."
