ANAPHYLAXIS

The term prophylaxis is common to our every day language. It means defending or protecting against disease.

Anaphylaxis, however, is a term confined to medical usage. Its meaning is the opposite of prophylaxis.

There are certain reactions in the body which under certain circumstances favor its interests and under other circumstances produce injurious results. Anaphylactic reactions belong to this latter group.

To make this matter clear consider, for example, but only by way of illustration, the reflex action of scratching.

If some portion of the body itches

It will be scratched, even if the person is asleep. This reflex action is useful, and hence may be called prophylactic; when the itch is caused by, say, an insect, for the action will drive the insect away.

If, however, the itch is due to ringworm, or to eczema, then the scratching will in no way remove the irritating agent, but will, on the contrary, either spread the disease or further injure the affected part. Such a result might be a considered anaphylactic in nature.

This anaphylactic reaction is the result of the chemical response of the body cells to agents to which they have become sensitized. Experimentally this type of reaction was observed as far back as the middle of the last century.

It is only comparatively recently that its connection with asthma, bronchitis, hay fever, urticaria, and other similar conditions came to be appreciated. While much remains to be known about the mechanisms involved in these disease conditions, they are known to be due in part at least to the body's sensitization to foreign substances, mainly of a protein nature.

This knowledge is applied both in the diagnosis and treatment of the diseases mentioned.

Grid Death Toll ONLY 22 IN 1931 (Continued From Page One) football should be cleared of the responsibility for the deaths improperly charged against it. At the same time it is also fitting that football take stock of itself to see what risks may be eliminated and what safeguards may be raised to prevent death in the near future.

Yost drew the following conclusions from the study: (1) That the number of fatal injuries is in inverse proportion to the degree of coaching, training and medical supervision exercised. (2) That apparently it is more dangerous to play on the defense than on the offense. (3) That the most frequent cause of death is fracture of cervical vertebrae. (4) That fatal injuries occur principally as the result of players being struck on neck, head or abdomen by the hard fibre thigh guards. (5) That minor injuries, cuts, scratches, etc., should receive immediate attention, especially to prevent infections.

12 Hurt on Defense The investigation showed that 12 players were injured fatally while playing on the defense. Seven were injured on the offense, and in three cases timea of the injury was unknown.

Only one report of a football death suggested that roughness was a contributory cause of injury. Yost offers four suggestions to make the game safer: "All equipment should be designed not only for the protection of the wearer, but also with consideration for the safety of the opponent. "Players should be impressed with the great importance of paying immediate attention to cuts, scratches, abrasions and other avenues of infection. "Officials who will penalize unnecessary roughness."
