Washington was again appointed head of the army when war threatened in 1798. He exposed himself on horseback in cold and snow and was attacked with quinsy or acute laryngitis.

Washington remained characteristically serene until the end. "I die hard but I am not afraid to go," he said.

His death at 10 p. m. Dec. 14, 1799, plunged the nation in mourning. The entire country felt, in John Lee's famous words, that Washington was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

Basketball Not Too Strenuous, Allen Declares

This is the seventh of a series of articles by Forrest C. Allen, director of athletics at the University of Kansas and nationally known basketball coach.

By Forrest C. Allen. LAWRENCE, Kas., Feb. 20 (AP).—What a good heart you must have to play the strenuous indoor game of basketball! However, I am convinced the game is not too strenuous for a normal, healthy boy.

Basketball to a spectator seems more strenuous than it actually is, because an observer naturally follows the ball, which is the focus of activity.

Cabot, English physician, declares athlete's heart a myth. He denies the heart dilates after athletic contests and marathon races. In such circumstances, he insists, the X-ray shows it is generally smaller than usual.

Hypertrophy, or enlarged heart, does not result from muscular exertion, according to Cabot, no matter how great and prolonged, when diseases haven't affected the organ.

"The cases of weak, rapid or irregular heart action, occurring in adolescence or later and wrongly supposed to be due to athletics, are in fact cases of nervous heart or post-infectious weakness, contracted often by the alarm produced by a mistaken diagnosis of heart strain, dilation or athlete's heart."

Daily tracings of the heart by the X-ray, both before and after play, revealed no increase in the size of the heart. Indeed, in some cases, the size showed a decrease.

FOUNDER CONCURS. Dr. James Naismith, founder and originator of basketball, has conducted some scientific experiments which substantiate the above mentioned statements.

A squad of young men with no previous basketball team experience was chosen for the test. This group was given the same daily fundamental drill and team play that a group of varsity players would receive for a period of 18 weeks.

Daily tracings of the heart by the X-ray, both before and after play, revealed no increase in the size of the heart. Indeed, in some cases, the size showed a decrease.

ACTIVITY LIMITED. A second interesting test of a different nature was made on four high school teams entered in a tournament, to ascertain the actual number of minutes that the average high school basketball player was in motion during an entire game.

A separate watch was kept on each of the 20 boys in the games. Whenever a player stopped, the watch was stopped and the count was resumed again when the player resumed activity. The results were as follows:

- 1. Average time elapsed for one ten minute period of play—13 minutes.
2. Shortest time of activity for any one player—3 minutes, 32 seconds.
3. Longest time of activity for any one player—7 minutes, 21 seconds.
4. Average time of activity for each player—5 minutes, 28 seconds.
5. Percentage of average activity of each player to the entire playing time—39.6 per cent.
