

Yen to Write of Broadway Puts Texas Girl on Stage

By William Gaines NEW YORK (AP)—Katherine Mauk...

She wanted to know New York life and write about it. She had no illusion that publishers were waiting to grab up her manuscripts...

Broadway and the people of the show world fascinated her. There was the life she wanted to write about. Soon it occurred to Miss Mauk that the best way to learn about any sort of life is to live it.

She came here equipped with beauty, brown eyes and golden hair, as well as her knowledge of stenography. Carrying on at the orphanage, she got an engagement to appear in the floor show at a restaurant. The hours did not conflict. She was able to see Broadway from the inside.

Broadway also saw Miss Mauk, and recognized the charm of the 23-year-old Texas girl (maybe in all fairness it should be recorded that she was born in Clovis, N. Mex.).

Florenz Ziegfeld heard about her. Now she is in his revival of "Show Boat," and her beauty stands out in an ensemble that includes such glorified girls as Marjorie Edwards, Cajo Eric and Elsie Roset.

"But," says Miss Mauk, who also says she is Scotch-Irish, "I learned a lot about life there, too." The stage is thrilling, she finds. She sings and dances, and she won't turn down opportunities to get ahead in musical productions.

But whatever she does, wherever she goes, on the stage or off, Miss Mauk will be writing about life as she lives it. Only when she knows success as an author will her fondest dream come true.

Chats With Parents PLAYING HOUSE By Alice Judson Peale The classic game of childhood, "playing house"—what does it really mean to the children?

They sweep and cook, go to bed, bring up a family of dolls with all sorts of disciplinary measures, call the doctor, prescribe medicines, give parties, and dramatize the family dinner table.

Educators have interpreted this sort of play as being simply a pleasure in mimicry. In imitating and repeating the activities of that part of the adult world of which children know most.

Many an adult, watching, has had the uncomfortable feeling that the children have steeled up the weaknesses of their elders and are making fun of them in their own way.

Yet probably the children are really doing something quite different. A game of playing house is the best means of working out various suppressed feelings about various things.

In playing the roles of father and mother, children identify themselves with them, assume their power and privileges.

The heavy punishments from time to time befalling various dolls are the expression of cruel and vengeful wishes which they may feel toward brothers and sisters or toward some oppressive grown-up.

For again a doll is much loved and pampered, just as they wish they were. It is allowed unheard of privileges and leads a life which is a round of pleasure just as they wish they themselves could do.

Probably the real worth of playing house lies less in the opportunity it offers for the correlation and clarifying of the children's observations of the world about them than in the direct outlet for a number of their most compelling wishes.
