BONUS ARMY FIGHTS

When veterans from all over the nation began pouring into the city of Washington by the thousands many weeks ago, most American citizens were opposed to the movement, but thought it would do no harm.

The general opinion was that the veterans were selfish in demanding the immediate cash payment of their certificates at a time when the government was already struggling to balance its budget, and when thousands of non-veterans were also in need. The voters believed that if congress were to begin handing out cash, it should be granted to all unemployed, whether veterans or not. They also believed that the bonus army in Washington was a threat against Democratic government, and an attempt to frighten congress into passing legislation in favor of a single class in spite of the general will of the people. And they felt that unemployed persons should stay in their own home towns where they could be cared for by local relief facilities.

But the veterans continued to flock to the national capital where they lived on scanty rations and under conditions that were undesirable to say the least, and used every legal means of influencing the national lawmakers to cash the bonus certificates. In spite of several threatened outbreaks and disagreements among the bonus marchers themselves, the police of the District of Columbia were able to control the situation without resort to force, although the marchers were granted certain facilities which no ordinary citizen has a right to demand.

When congress adjourned without granting the wishes of the unemployed veterans, many of them took advantage of the government's arrangements for transportation to their home cities, realizing that they would gain nothing by staying longer in Washington. But considerable numbers of them held true to their slogan, "We're here to stay till we get our pay," though they had no idea how they were going to get it.

The remaining veterans, with little food and small prospects of getting their bonus money, have been in none too pleasant a mood lately; and the unfortunate fact is that some among their ranks are not veterans at all, but communists and others who are trying to stir up trouble. It was no great surprise, therefore, when they forcibly resisted orders to evacuate the partially demolished buildings they had been occupying. And it is not surprising that a policeman should use his gun in self-defense when attacked by angry men throwing backshots.

The whole affair is most regrettable; it is unfortunate that the authorities had to resort to force. But it is remarkable that the conflict was so long held off in spite of the dangerous situation that had been existing for many weeks. The police have exhibited the greatest tactfulness and restraint; but the final clash was almost inevitable. The mob spirit is the deadly enemy of justice and good government and would destroy our nation if it were not made to feel the full force of the law.

JUSTICE HANDICAPPED

Few meetings of bar associations and other organizations of lawyers have been held in the United States in recent years when the question of reforming the procedure in the administration of criminal law has not occupied a leading place in their deliberations and discussions. This is significant of a widespread recognition of the need for such reform and of the growing disrespect for all law which may be directly traced to the lack of public confidence in the practical operation of the machinery of our criminal courts.

What is more remarkable, however, is the small progress that has been made in the formulation and application of the needed reforms. The majority of jurists and barristers, with the exception, perhaps, of the lawyers immediately engaged in practice in the criminal courts, are keenly alive to the discredit brought upon the legal profession and the courts by the notorious defeat of justice which is permitted by existing practices.

How far this condition is within the power of the courts to reform may be questioned, in view of the practice of legislature to dictate details of court procedure which should be left to the judges themselves. But as lawyers compose the majority in many legislative bodies, the bar cannot escape its responsibility for the existing conditions nor for the failure to apply effective remedies.

COVE (Special)—Earl J. Stackland is putting up a new and fancy pack. The cherries are packed in an oblong cardboard box with a cellophane face eight one way by five the other. It is a very attractive package and is expected to bring a fancy price on the market. Mr. Stackland has been packing for eight or ten days and has shipped out nine cars of blacks and expects to ship five more. The co-operative shipping association, which has been packing for the same length of time, has shipped 15,000 crates and according to the number of crates a car, this is more than 13 cars. Morganatic Alliances

A morganatic marriage is one practiced in some countries by royalty or other persons which while existing precludes any other marriage and makes children of the marriage legitimate, does not give to either the wife or the children any right of possession or succession to the lands, properties, titles or dignity of the husband and father. It is of German origin and is not recognized by law in England.
