Gambler's Throw by Eustace L. Adams

SYNOPSIS: Jerry Calhoun and Nancy Wentworth are reunited after their secret marriage by Limpy Ashwood, who had tried to marry Nancy. Ashwood has kidnapped her and five men, one of whom has been murdered, and holds them on an island for ransom. Lucel, a gambler, and the prisoners, hope to out-trick Ashwood.

Chapter 23 SUPPRESSED HATE

"If you'll excuse us, we'll go out on the porch," Jerry told Ashwood. "We find the room crowded." He turned to Nancy, who, repressing a start of surprise, rose instantly and put her arm through his.

"Why not, indeed?" agreed the cripple. "I think it is duly recorded in the 'Book of Etiquette' that the young couple should invariably stay for an hour or two gazing stilly-eyed at the moonlight, if any."

Jerry stood there in hesitation, his self-control waning to a thin edge by the subtle taunt. As Ashwood had only been of Lucel's build! What pleasure he would take in beating him down! Nancy's slight pressure on his arm brought him back to reason. He bowed mockingly and followed his wife out into the darkness.

Hamilton swept his seven rows of cards together, placed the deck meticulously in the upper left corner of the table and, murmuring a conventional word of apology, left the room.

The wide, comfortable porch in the utter quiet of the triple light, was like a harbor of peace after the throbbing intensity of the living room. Nancy stepped to the railing, silently surveying the long, sparkling path of moonlight across the black waters.

"What do you think Ashwood will do, Jerry?" she whispered. "I don't know, Nancy," he answered honestly. "It hit him hard that's the only thing I'm sure of. I'm getting so I don't know what anyone will do. We're all strained to the snapping point. Word was percolated through the crowd, that Ashwood is flying away from here tomorrow. There's been a lot of activity at the hangar all afternoon. One-shot and Hamilton have asked me a dozen times whether we're going to be released tomorrow or not. Ashwood has said nothing about it and they're all afraid we're going to be left here while he gets away. If we have another hot night tonight, there's no telling what may happen. The whole place vibrates with suppressed hate."

"If he takes me away tomorrow, I'll jump out of his plane," she burst out passionately. "And if I'm tied in, I'll jump overboard from his yacht tomorrow night."

"He won't take you away," he declared firmly. "The first move he makes toward you in the morning I'll grab him with my two hands and break his back before his guards can pull a trigger. If I were positive he still had it in his mind I'd walk right in there and do it now."

"Please, Jerry," she whispered. "Aren't things bad enough now without your adding to them before it becomes necessary?"

He made no reply, being afraid that if he spoke at all, it would be to say too much. He dared not even look at her came-like profile, lest he lose the words which trembled upon his lips. For some moments they stood there in silence. At last:

"Nancy, you—you aren't worrying about—tom—tom, are you?" "I don't know, Jerry," she confessed, hardly above a whisper. "I was watching Ashwood's face when he listened to your anxious request. It's going to make it as difficult as he can for us, if only out of a perverse wish for revenge."

"Well, he's returned, cursing himself for his gambling about in a difficult situation, we'll have to make a pretense of being really married, you know, or all this bustle won't do any good."

Why couldn't he express himself to girls as he could to men? If he were talking to a fellow, now, he'd have no trouble. But here he was floundering like a silly kid, making it more difficult for her instead of less. His cheeks were hot, too. It was fortunate that the night in his face. He'd give his share of the reward, right now, if Lucel or Malloy were to stride out on the porch and give him someone to poke at.

"Listen, Nancy," he added. "You go to bed early. After you've gone to sleep I'll just creep in and stretch myself on the floor right against the door. You'll never know I've been there."

She was still silent. The pause seemed interminable. "Poor little girl," he murmured

He learned the millers trade in the Pioneer Mill at Island City where he was employed for a number of years. He also worked at the La Grande Flouring mill which is owned by the same company. From here he went to Seattle and Tacoma, Wash., and then to Reno, Nev., where he followed the same trade. Because of ill health he was forced to give up his position and return to Union county, where he operated the old home place known as the Midway farm on the Island City highway which is now owned by Mr. and Mrs. Walter Williams.

Shortly after the passing of his mother, which was in the spring of 1918, he and his father and sister moved to La Grande. He accepted a position as head gardener at Hot Lake where he worked for five or six years.

His father passed on March 29, 1925; he was married to Ethel Moore and this happy union was cut too short by the sudden death of one of sterling quality, generous to a fault and interested in everybody's welfare. Those that have had personal contact with him are the ones that know him best and appreciate the friendship of such a fine character which is never forgotten and lives always in one's memories.

Besides his widow, he leaves to mourn his passing one sister, Mrs. Betty Kohr, of Boise; three brothers, Charles, of Anacosta, Mont.; Lester, of Yakima; and John, of La Grande, and other relatives and a host of friends.

JAMES HARNEY QUINLAND (Contributed)

Funeral services for James Harney Quinland were held Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock at the Snodgrass and Zimmerman mortuary with Rev. W. H. Herzog, pastor of the First Methodist church, officiating. Paul Knautz sang. Burial took place in the family plot at the Masonic cemetery.

Mr. Quinland was born in Kentucky April 22, 1873 and was 59 years, three months and six days of age at the time of his death.

When just a young man he moved to Oregon with his parents, the late James and Belle Quinland, later moving to Union county where he made his home since 1895.

He learned the millers trade in the Pioneer Mill at Island City where he was employed for a number of years. He also worked at the La Grande Flouring mill which is owned by the same company.
