The TINNITES

(READ THE STORY, THEN COLOR THE PICTURE) OF course the Tinnies gathered 'round when Duncy was knocked to the ground. The punch the monkey gave him took him right off of his feet. The monkey, in the meantime, stood nearby. He knew that he was good. Poor Duncy looked around a bit and said, "That blow was neat."

FALK'S What Has Become of Quality? Someone has estimated that if all the pages of price - appeal advertising printed during the past year were laid end to end, they would reach to the moon. Where has quality gone? Have taste, appreciation and discrimination disappeared? Of course, we don't think so. We know better.

BASEBALL IN LA GRANDE

Baseball fans are keeping close watch of the results in the major leagues these days, as the time for the big world's series draws near. There is something fascinating about these baseball scores, percentages and batting averages, even to one who does not attend the games.

A good baseball game stimulates the imaginations of the youngsters who long to attain the skill of their elders; its elements of skill and uncertainty furnish delightful entertainment for all; and it quickens the blood of those who are too old to play but who vividly remember those days of youthful activity.

We are fortunate to have a baseball team in La Grande this year, which has successfully carried on an extended schedule of games and filled the gap in athletic activities which is usually created by school vacation periods.

In this connection we should commend them upon arranging the game with the House of David team here next Monday. The visitors do not usually play in so small a city as La Grande without a better financial guarantee than they are getting here.

A NIGHT IN THE WOODS

When a boy gets to be eight years old, he usually feels that the tales which delight younger children are pretty empty and foolish. And if he has to listen to too many of them he's apt to bust loose and do something about it.

Recent New York papers had a delightfully appealing little "human interest" story about what one eight-year-old did in such circumstances. He was Robert Driscoll, an Ohio lad who was staying with his mother at a summer cottage near Madison, Conn. Near the cottage was an extensive forest, and Robert had put in several days listening to the younger children tell about the bears, wolves, kidnapers, witches and hobgoblins that infested that stretch of woodland.

At last Robert couldn't stand it any longer. So, without saying anything to anyone, he wandered off into the woods to see for himself if all of those marvels really existed.

Night came and Robert didn't come home. So, pretty soon, the state police went out to look for him. A volunteer posse of summer residents joined them. Bloodhounds were put on the trail. Boy Scouts were called out to help. All night the search went on without result.

Shortly after dawn, however, the state police found Robert. He was sitting peacefully on a bed of moss by the riverside. He had slept there all night, he was not in the least worried or uncomfortable, and he couldn't understand what the fuss was all about.

"Camping out," he said, "is fun, and all that stuff about witches and wolves is bunk. There's nothing to be afraid of." There could hardly be a better illustration of the adventurous spirit of young boyhood. A child of eight or thereabouts is in a very strange world which is full of mysteries, and the only way he can be sure about things is to look into them for himself.
