A FORGED SIGNATURE By Alice Hudson Peale A girl turned in her report card to her class teacher along with the copy book in which she had written some exercises for correction. The moment the teacher looked at the signature at the bottom of the card she knew that the girl had forged her mother's name.

Later when she picked up the copy book to look over the exercises a sheet of paper fell out on which were written the practice attempts for the signature.

The fact that the girl had left this sheet where the teacher would most certainly find it showed quite plainly that she had been unable to perpetrate this piece of dishonesty without so arranging it that she would be caught. The strivings of her conscience caused her to betray herself despite her conscious efforts to deceive.

Such a child is far from lacking in a moral sense but she is in need of help. Undoubtedly fear of parental wrath over bad marks had caused her to find such a bad way out of her difficulty.

Of first importance it was for her that her teacher at once confronted her with the evidence of her forgery and allowed her to confess and weep and promise never to do such a thing again. This must have lifted from the child's heart an enormous burden of guilt.

The teacher's next step was to talk with the girl's mother and ask her not to scold her any more when she brought home poor marks. She explained that it was fear of such scoldings that had forced the child to do what she knew to be dishonest.

Certainly then of the mother's co-operation the teacher gave the child a freshly made out report card to take home. It was returned promptly with the legitimate signature.

MRS. BOHAR IMPROVING BOISE, Idaho, Sept. 29 (AP)—The improvement in the condition of Mrs. William E. Bohar, ill with parrot fever, continues and the latest bulletins from her physicians indicate the wife of the United States senator has passed the critical stage.

Mrs. Bohar has shown continuous and marked improvement today, a bulletin late last night said.

AMEBIASIS The ameba, a humble, single-celled living thing, is employed as a prototype to teach students the secrets of the cell back to all human life.

The ameba used in biology classes is an innocuous creature, widespread throughout the world. Certain of its relatives are, however, responsible for serious diseases affecting man.

The multiform disease caused by the ameba is called amebiasis. The disease is widely prevalent in Egypt, India and in tropical countries, but it is also to be found in Europe, Great Britain and the United States, particularly in the southern states.

In a recent issue of the Journal of the American Medical association, Dr. Charles F. Craig of New Orleans estimates that between six and 12 million persons in the United States are infected with this parasite.

One form of this disease is known as amebic dysentery. The symptoms differ according to the severity of the condition, frequent stools laden with mucus, and occasionally tinged with blood being common.

There may be, in addition, abdominal pain, headache, and a sense of weakness.

As a complication of this disease, examination of the food handlers and of those connected with the preparation and distribution of food, believing that it is through infected individuals employed in food industries that the spread of infection takes place.

Dr. Craig maintains that while we do not commonly see the acute and serious forms of amebiasis in the United States, nevertheless a large part of the population is infected.

Many of these infected individuals complain of nondescript symptoms such as weakness, headache, loss of appetite, low-grade fever and the like. As a practical public health procedure, he recommends the routine
