JAPAN TO SEND SECOND COLONY INTO MANCHURIA

By James A. Mills HARBIN, Manchuria (AP) - Encouraged by the success of 500 former soldiers who have settled at Chamsau, north of Harbin, the Japanese government will send another group of 900 ex-army men to colonize an area 100 miles northeast of here on the Sangari river. Members of the second emigrant group are receiving special training for their new vocations as farmers and artisans before sailing from Japan.

Radicals Are Barred

Only Japanese men with few or no family ties, able to endure hardships, free from radical tendencies, and below 35 years of age, are eligible as settlers in the new colonies. It is hoped these new communities will form the nuclei of large future settlements of Japanese in Manchuria.

Colours Fight Bandits

But with the gradual suppression of banditry, and with direct material aid from the home government, Japanese settlers have shown greater readiness to try a new life. The present Japanese colonists in the Chamsau region, have frequently been attacked by Chinese marauders and robbers, but in each case the former Japanese service men have driven off the raiders without themselves suffering serious casualties.
