"Now, let's be patient," Scouty said. "I think, if I just use my head, that I can think of some good plan to help poor Doty out. The tree that's holding her is tall and we would have no chance at all to pull her from the limbs. Oh my, just hear the poor girl's shout."

"She's merely scared," said Windy. "She seems just as safe as safe can be as long as that old tree hangs on and doesn't let her drop. Perhaps the tree's just having fun, and likes the play beneath the sun. It's running now. I wish I knew how I could make it stop."

POOR Doty, in the meantime, was a very frightened girl because she still was held high in the air. "Please put me down," she cried.

"I'd rather be right on the ground. Your running makes me bob around. Why did I let you catch me, when I had a chance to hide?"

"Well, I don't know," the big tree snapped, "but in my long arm you were trapped. I haven't any playmates, so I think I'll keep you here."

"As long as you treat me real kind I will do nothing you will mind, but if you get real naughty you will have a lot to fear."

WEE Duncy heard this and he cried. "I have a plan that can be tried. Our good old friend the Imp gave me a funny magic flute."

"He said, 'If something goes amiss, don't worry, son. Just blow on this.' Now, little lads, and you will shortly hear us make it too!"

"Ah right, we're waiting," Scouty said. "Why hesitate, lad? Go ahead. However, I can't see what good a thing like that can do."

"We'll soon find out," cried Duncy. Then he tooted once, and once again. "That's terrible," said Goldy. "Kindly hurry and get through."
