Rosicrucians Of City Represented At San Jose Meet

Rosicrucians of La Grande were represented at the recent international convention of the order held in San Jose, Cal., July 15 to 22, by Mrs. R. A. Tull of 1201 Eleventh street. Nearly 700 from four foreign jurisdictions of the order attended the mystical conclaves, she reports. "The sessions of the convention were devoted to lectures and addresses on mystical, philosophical and scientific topics in accordance with the object of the organization," she said.

"Of outstanding interest to the delegates was a demonstration of the color organ in the Francis Bacon auditorium of the order. The color organ was created under the direction of Dr. H. Spencer Lewis, supreme officer of the order, in the Rosicrucian laboratory after years of research. When selections were played upon the organ, the consciousness becomes aware of the harmony not alone through the sense of hearing, but also through the visual appreciation of the blending of magnificent colors projected upon a large silk screen. The present project of the Rosicrucian experimental laboratory is the development of an electrical device for measuring the magnetic radiations of the human, or the aura, and an attempt to manifest them to the naked eye."

The convention adopted resolutions for the further extension of the junior order activities throughout the world, and the continued assertion in all literature and newspaper advertisements that the order is not a religious fraternity. In further accord with the educational principles of the order, it was resolved that there be a continuation of donations of the monthly periodical "The Rosicrucian Digest," to public libraries throughout the world.

NAZI DOCTRINE IN TEXT BOOKS STIRS AUSTRIA

By Wade Werner
VIENNA (AP)—Educational authorities of Austria are revising school histories as one way of helping Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss' campaign for perpetuation of Austria's independence.

The movement had its motive in the fact that while Dollfuss was urging the people to resist the Nazi doctrine of union with Germany, the textbooks were preaching "anschluss" to the youngsters.

Language Passes State Lines
Says one of these text books under the caption "Germany, Nation and State": "The territory inhabited by the German people is Germany, which is larger than the German reich. State and nation do not always occupy identical territory; the language boundaries of peoples seldom coincide with state boundaries."

"And so great sections of German-speaking territory belong to foreign states. Even the union of the two purely German states, the German reich and Austria, has not yet been attainable."

"To be sure, the law of November

12, 1918, which determined the form of the newly created Austrian republic, contained also the paragraph: "German Austria is a constituent part of the German republic."

"But the world war victors, particularly France, England and Italy, prohibited in the peace treaty the union of the two states; notwithstanding that all Germans fervently desire this 'anschluss.'"

Would Recall Austria's Past
Supporters of Dollfuss also point out that the textbooks have little to say about Austria's glorious past.

What irritates some of these critics even more is the hammer-and-sickle motif in the present Austrian coat of arms, which is reproduced in some of the textbooks with the accompanying line: "Note the hammer and sickle."

In other words, the existing books contain passages which can be used as Nazi propaganda by teachers inclined to sympathize with the Anschluss movement, or as Marxist propaganda ("note the hammer and sickle") by teachers who lean to the left.

"Get out your old history books and tell the children what Austrians achieved in past generations," was the appeal Dollfuss recently made to parents.
