A WISE MOVE

When the federal government began turning more and more attention to farm aid measures this year, it meant more to insure the return of prosperity to the small towns and cities of the nation than many other more widely-heralded legislative moves. As a matter of fact, it probably will do more to insure the return of permanent prosperity, or at least a condition akin to prosperity, than any other one thing for towns and cities located in agricultural communities.

La Grande, a city that has boasted much of its payrolls and its industrial activities, nevertheless owes much of its life blood to the farms of the Grande Ronde and Wallowa valleys. One cannot overlook the importance of the railroad, or of the sawmills, or of similar industrial activity, but in the last analysis, the farm is the most important of them all.

There is a reason. It is not of a sentimental type, or of a tax-paying nature — other industries pay taxes just as well if not better than the farm population. It is deeper than that. It goes down to what happens to the dollar that the produce brings in. When the farmer makes money, practically all of it is spent in his immediate community. The merchants, the industrialists and others benefit directly from his purchases, made possible by fair prices that enable him to make a fair profit. His produce, also the produce of industries dependent upon him — such as flouring mills, etc. — brings new money into the community. His profits or his surplus, whatever you wish to call it, do not go east — they begin their work here at home.

That's the real reason why the cities in agricultural communities turn optimistic when farm products go up in price — the farm doesn't drain the money coffers of the community when it is making money, it adds to their treasures.

Senator Huey Long's face was punched in a gentleman's retiring room at Long Island the other day, according to the newspapers. Politicians who have never approved of Long's "huey" probably were not long faced when they read of the episode.

strenuously oppose any attempt to gain it at the expense of station KOAC, as any loss of power resulting from establishment of a station in La Grande would seriously cripple the ability of KOAC to continue to serve the people of the state," said Wallace L. AT THE LIBERTY

Allan Dinohart and Carole Lombard in a scene from "Supernatural."

Spirits that hurdle through the night, tables that rise mysteriously from the floor, trumpets floating strangely through dark rooms, voices speaking from the void—these and other miraculous phenomena make up part of the exciting action in the splendidly produced Paramount picture, "Supernatural." The picture opened today at the Liberty theatre. The story, a sympathetic treatment of the physical phenomena brought to public attention by such world-famous figures as Sir Oliver Lodge and the late Sir Arthur Conan-Doyle, moves with rapidly as it depicts the strange complexities of a female "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." Carole Lombard has the role of this occult personality and gives a splendid performance in the part. The producers, Victor and Edward Halperin, you will remember, were responsible for the eerie "White Zombie" that was so successful last year.
