First Court Skirmish Won By The Knox Law

ing the city of Klamath Falls argued for a temporary restraining order on the grounds the liquor act passed by the special session of the legislature was unconstitutional as well as being a revenue raising measure automatically prohibiting attachment of the emergency clause.

Jay Bowerman, representing the state liquor commission, held the act did not violate the constitution because cities were limited to own regulation of liquor subject to the criminal laws of the state.

Judge Lewelling, in denying the temporary restraining order, declared the large part of the state's population outside of the cities would be without regulation and it was the duty of the court to assume the act valid until it was proved otherwise.
