nothing to show for it. A shell that has exploded, a ship that has gone to the bottom, a man who has been turned into a corpse—these are not, in any economy, dividend-producing items. They are what our billions brought in the World War. Today we are spending to build things: We are building highways and bridges and dams and towns and homes, we are spending to strengthen banks and railroads and farms and factories, we are spending to make men and women and children strong and healthy and courageous. We shall have all these things after the spending is over.

SEATTLE, Jan. 22 (AP)—A Washington State invasion by both Oregon teams this week, their first of the season, tests the league-leading University of Washington Huskies, on top of the northern division, Pacific coast conference, and gives Washington State a chance for some revenge.

The Oregon State Beavers face the toughest task, with games at Moscow, Idaho, against the Idaho Vandals on Tuesday and Wednesday nights, and with Washington State on Friday and Saturday nights. The Vandals sprang a surprise win Saturday night at Pullman over Washington State, 34 to 28, their first of the year.

Oregon State and Washington State divided their two games at Corvallis at the start of the season.

The present hatchery building at Union will be continued in operation. Mr. Crockett said.

authority and effort were contained in a resolution unanimously adopted here last night by the executive committee of the Oregon department of the American Legion.

The committee, it was pointed out, spoke for 18 legion posts and about 10,000 members in Oregon.

The report dealt at considerable length with the proper and "popular" definition of "a veteran," and the use of the word as now defined by regulation or opinion, to include persons who have not had service during war-periods, was deplored.

A New Serial by Herbert Jensen

Hold on, Frank. You phoned and couldn't reach her?"

"Yes, it worried me. I—say, how do you know?"

Winslow chuckled into his glass. "She wanted the studio with Myberg and Ortega and me. She was confined all right but not to her bed. There's a new picture coming up—a honey—foreign stuff. She's to be the golden haired lead; I'm to fly the stunts."

"They were discussing who'll play opposite her, but they can't tell who'd fit until the continuity men hack out a plot. What d'ye mean she's frail and delicate? You couldn't club that girl to death—she's white-

Chapter Five
INTRODUCING SPIN

IT WAS natural that Grahame be asked to come to Hollywood on an "opportunity contract". It was natural that he should accept it. Grahame was quite willing that he be "found." He loved the jungle; he would always love it, but civilization had begun to take on a more substantial glamor that he had ever thought possible.

He would always feel a poignant ache at dawn or at sunset, in Hollywood flocks of parrots do not spin like vivid green wheels against a background of old rose, smooth as vanilla do not shudder between sullen walls of jungle, nor do strange flower scents wrap you when you sleep.

Nevertheless Grahame liked cities, at any rate, this one. He had discovered two old buddies among the flying stunt-men. Another had "gone native" and played haves. These spoke of still others that he would remember knowing well before he quit piloting planes for plotting jungle expeditions—personable, adventurous fellows that he had known in far corners, with whom he could yarn in vainglorious exaggeration.

He was about to make his decision to stay when he met Janice Kent. As he helped her from her car and across the lawn to her Beverly Hills house he was sure that this accidental meeting was about to add pleasant finality to this decision.

A maid took his hat from him within the entrance. Janice smiled toward him as she mounted the stairs.

"I'll be down in a minute or two," she said. "I'll phone Mr. Greene in the meantime."

In the drawing room, standing before the open fireplace, Frank thrust his upturned palms toward the crackling logs. It seemed incongruous in these tastefully appointed surroundings of civilization to allow himself to think of sinister shadows, of furtive pursuit; yet a frown of abstracted reflection remained on his forehead.

Thoughtfully he rubbed at the slight soreness of his right knuckles. He could not drive away the mental image of the vulture-like profile shadowed on the studio window. Some dim memory faintly stirred—obscure as the hushed pulse of a native drum felt, rather than heard, across miles of jungle.

Frank helped her across the lawn, bone and gristle under that skin you love to touch."

GRAHAME'S gesture interrupted the other.

"Who's Ortega?"

"A gentleman from Central America, Mexican, maybe." Winslow drained his glass and set it down. He showed up here a month ago with a lot of an idea. Well, you know the publicity these Chichen Itza ruins in Yucatan are getting? He says he knows bigger and better ruins further in that country with more jungle around for the atmosphere shots.

"You know how Myberg loves his authentic backgrounds,—or should—if you've looked at his pictures. Well this Don Raoul Ortega's idea is to use that old Maya business as the foundation. You've read stories of the blond gods those ancient folks used to worship."

"Well this is to be a blond goddess picture, or at least she is to be his bride. The Bride of Quetzalcoatl is the tentative name." He laughed.

"Myberg said he didn't like the name. It reminded too many people of pants and vests."

Grahame smiled. He liked this gossip fellow whose nerves were of steel beneath his happy-to-lucky, cynical exterior. But he wanted to know more of this man Ortega whose name Janice Kent had defended so arbitrarily the evening before.

He decided to take Spin partly into his confidence. He told him that Miss Kent seemed to agree that the idea that the accident may have been planned until Ortega's name was brought definitely into focus as the party responsible.
