SHOULD KNOW FACTS

Nearly a decade ago General William Mitchell created a great uproar by charging that America wasn't getting what it was paying for in the way of military air services.

Now the stage seems set for another uproar of the same kind. The army took over the airmail routes. Several army flyers were killed in the performance of their duty.

It is already apparent that the exact ins and outs of this situation are going to be extremely hard to get at. Bias and partisanship are appearing on both sides of the argument.

During the last decade the nation has spent large sums on its military aviation services. It has spent enough money to have an air corps equal in equipment and dependability to any in the world.

Out of the present airmail mixup there should come a thorough, far-reaching investigation. Not one designed to get the heat of this man or that man, not one designed to show some corporation up, or gain political advantage for one faction or another.

It is already apparent that the exact ins and outs of this situation are going to be extremely hard to get at. Bias and partisanship are appearing on both sides of the argument.
