The Garden

MAKING A GARDEN CLAY

Contrary to the opinion of many, clay soil is not the worst kind of base for a garden, although it causes difficulties if not properly treated. In its natural state it cuts like soap when wet, and bakes like brick when dry, but these two extremes can be easily modified with a little inexpensive care. In many ways it is superior to a sandy, or gravelly soil, because it can be built into something more desirable with less expense.

A common problem in many communities is a thin layer of surface soil on top of a heavy clay subsoil. Here, the clay must be loosened or loosened for a foot or more deep before suitable garden growth can be obtained, and the best means of doing this is by liberally adding crushed limestone or applying lime, using one pound of the refined lime for every square yard.

Lime has a physical effect upon clay, causing its fine particles to collect in coarser grains, which makes a looser, more mellow soil. Additions of manure or compost, or a goodly quantity of sifted coal ashes or fine gravel, may also be given. This, if it is well spaced into the clay, will break up the tendency to cake, and in a surprisingly short time treatment in this manner will result in an excellent garden bed.

If the gardener cannot treat his entire area the first year, he may take a section at a time. He may also sow a crop of clover, which he can spade into the soil, repeating the process on a different spot the following year. This adds nitrogen and humus to the clay.

There is lots of plant food in clay soil if the roots of the plants can work themselves into it.

Mary went to market

Here's the story. There's even a moral so don't say you weren't warned in advance. Mary—poor darling—went to market and fell for the seeming economy of "bargain counter" coffee. But she quickly learned that—even though you buy coffee by the pound—you don't drink it by the pound. You drink it by the cup. And true economy is based on how many satisfactory cups you get from the pound. Mary discovered that Hills Bros. Coffee makes a greater number of completely delicious cups per pound because of the greater abundance of strength and flavor. MORAL: For real economy as well as supreme coffee flavor, always ask for Hills Bros. Coffee.
