STRIKE WARS TELL HOW PEOPLE FEEL

When a strike boils over into pitched warfare of the kind seen recently in Minneapolis and Toledo, it ceases to be an industrial dispute and comes perilously close to being class war. The violence of the current strikes, therefore, gives them a significance far more weighty than that usually involved in an argument between workers and employers. It is futile, that is, to try to understand these troubles simply by looking at the specific things the strikers are demanding and the specific things which the employers are willing to give them. Fighting as bad as that which has been seen in these two cities has a deeper reason than any mere disagreement about hours and wages.

Something is on the workers' minds—something that makes them angry and reckless enough to risk policemen's clubs, tear gas, and national guardsmen's bullets. No matter how much we may deplore the results, we should be very foolish if we did not try hard to find out just what it is that is wrong.

It is probable that basically the trouble comes from a deep discontent with the way the recovery program is working out. We are just emerging from a period of extreme hardship for the working man. All of us have suffered during the depression, but hardly any of us had quite such a thin time of it as the wage-earner. It has left him with what you might call a psychic scar that will be a long time healing.

Now, bearing that scar, the worker makes ready for the new deal and finds that in many cases it is being played with the same old cards, in the same old way. Fine words about human rights have been said at Washington, but they haven't been put into effect. There are still employers who look back to Homestead for lessons in the way to handle labor troubles. And Washington still postpones the job of formulating a definite and clear-cut labor policy.

All this, of course, does not excuse the violence which is breaking out. It doesn't bring dead men back to life, or make it right to toss bricks at policemen and troops. But it does help us to understand why men feel as they do feel. And it is vital that we get such understanding.

Before the NRA went into effect, there were fewer than 1000 of the longshoremen who belonged to the International Union. Now there are 15,000. The organizers took advantage of the law to encourage membership. As soon as the membership became so strong, strikes occurred. The NRA will go down in history as the Nourisher of Rebellious Attitudes among workmen.—Corvallis Gazette-Times.
